they who legislate upon party principles must expect their measures to react upon themselves. Did it not involve the dearest interests and safety of the country, I should rejoice that retribution has at last overtaken the men who have inflicted such deep injuries upon us. Suffer, greatly suffer, they must; but, the country!—we suffer with them, the innocent and the guilty alike, except the consolation which a good conscience never fails to administer.

Mr. Speaker, when I reflect on what our country once was, and might still have been, and what it now is; when I think of the blessings thrown away, and the miseries induced; my indignation against the cool, remorseless, perverse plotter of our afflictions and perils, is ready to burst forth on this floor in disorderly exclamations. My heart almost overflows with mingled grief and indignation. Daily do I expect the happening of some great event—the coming of some awful public calamity—to be decisive of our fate. A war of wide-spread, cruel desolation, threatened by a powerful and exasperated foe; the Union shaken to its very centre, and tottering to a fall; with a Government bankrupt in fortune and in fame!—and, yet, where are we; what doing; what have we done? Where are we? Look around! seated on a barren heath, amidst ruin; surrounded by the loathsome objects of our dishonor; indebted to the Vandals for the roof that covers us; the Government itself paralyzed—chained down, as it were—by the drowsiness that precedes death! And, yet, gentlemen seem perfectly at their ease—tranquil as the undisturbed moonbeams that play upon the gently-waving billows. They repose in the delusive idea that there is no danger. The sentinel upon the watch-tower has told them "all's well." When the midnight robber has sallied forth from his covert, and prowls about the streets for prey; when the mercenary has clapped his torch, and the city is wrapt in flames; the perfidious watchman, "twixt sleep and wake," cries from his box, all's well!

Sir, at this moment the cold, icy hand of death is on this people. The agony cannot be of long continuance; the crisis must soon be over. And, if we are doomed to fall, as a punishment for our sins as a nation, the day will have come when the blindest party zealot will acknowledge that but one man stood between his country and its salvation. God knows, sir, no one more devoutly and fervently wishes, than I do, that he may be inspired with the wisdom, virtue, and energy, to save the nation. But, all is dark and cheerless. I see no lambent ray of hope gilding the dreary prospect before us. The handwriting on the wall points to our fixed destiny. It is written in characters so glaring and so legible that he who runs may read. When, says the greatest moral philosopher of any age, did distress ever oblige a Prince to abdicate his authority? This bars up every avenue of escape.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop; but I will not leave the country in so forlorn and desperate a condition. No, sir, I will address myself especially to this body, holding as it does now, with the other branch, the destinies of the nation in its hands. Let them act with promptitude and vigor, and, in the language of the Secretary of the Treasury, resolve not to delay another moment in every Constitutional effort to save the country. If they attempt to violate the Constitution, they must sprinkle it with blood—with my blood;—for, I will not outlive the liberties of my country. Under the Constitution, the country can be saved, or let it fall. Consign this bill at once to the fate it merits. Adopt at once measures to revive public credit—to unite the people and fill your armies. Nec gentium quies sine armis, nec arma sine stipendiis, nec stipendia sine tributis.

My voice and arm are with you in every just and Constitutional measure for the defence of the country. Energy, wisdom, and virtue, will yet save the Republic. If we have them not; if we cannot bring ourselves, regardless of considerations of popularity, to discharge our sacred trust like men—like patriots; let us take the advice of the honorable member (Mr. FISK:) leave our seats, and render back our powers to the people.

When Mr. HANSON had concluded—

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, followed, in reply to some points of Mr. HANSON's speech, and in energetic defence of the bill.

[During the speeches of these gentlemen, both of them were called to order more than once by the SPEAKER, who earnestly endeavored to prevent the introduction of personal matter into the debate.]

Mr. GROSVENOR said he laid claim to no particular knowledge of the practical rules of banking. Like other gentlemen, he had studied the works of those who have been acknowledged the great masters of the science of political economy. But as many of their dogmas upon this subject had been refuted, and most of their rules had been exposed to doubt, if not to subversion, by the experience of modern times, he could not consent to detain the House with a repetition of them, however well they might subserve his purpose, or decorate his argument. Such a repetition would be the less excusable, as it was not necessary to his purpose; for it was not his intention to discuss the question as to the practicability of establishing, at this particular crisis, any bank which could aid the Government, and furnish a circulating medium for the nation.

This great question had, he said, been examined with much ability and eloquence by gentlemen on both sides of the House; and if he could concur in all the opinions, either of his friend from North Carolina, (Mr. GASTON,) or his colleague, (Mr. OAKLEY,) or his friend from New Hampshire, (Mr. WEBSTER,) he should certainly vote against any bank, however strongly founded, or artfully modelled.

They had, he said, with an energy of reasoning, and eloquence of language, distinct to be sure in the manner, but common to all of them, attempted to show, that in these times of peril and universal distrust, the project of a National Bank would be both dangerous and useless to the nation. To this conclusion, their arguments, however varied and dissimilar, clearly tended. In this conclusion he was not yet ready to concur with his honorable friends. I shall not, said Mr. G., attempt to conceal that many views of this subject which I had entertained, and many opinions which I held to be sound and correct, have been swept away by the reasoning and eloquence which have proceeded from them. Yet, sir, they have stopped far short of producing a conviction in my mind, that a bank may not now be framed, which, to a great extent, shall not furnish immediate relief to the Treasury, and a circulating medium to the nation. Whether this be practicable, however, or whether it be not, it is not my intention to examine. My objections to this bill cannot be affected by deciding this question; they rest on grounds totally distinct from any considerations so general, and so uncertain; they arise from the peculiar character of the bill itself; from the untempered materials of which it is constructed, and from the visionary character of its details.

To give the House full possession of his objections, Mr. G. said, it would be necessary to treat of topics, already much discussed, perhaps exhausted. As much brevity as was compatible with a clear view of them, he would promise.

A single glance, said Mr. G., at the miserable condition to which our unhappy country is reduced, must convince us all, that a vigorous and an immediate effort for her relief must be made, or she will surely perish.

With the authors of this mighty wreck and ruin, I will not talk of concert or union. I know them only as the spoilers of the choicest heritage with which the Almighty Father ever blessed a people. Were they only in jeopardy, I would raise my voice only to say, "sink, go to the bottom, and God speed your passage for the salvation of our country."

No, sir, I speak only for our country; for the country of our birth, where the bones of our fathers rest in the Lord, and where, in good time, we must sleep by their side. For that country, crying for succor, almost in the agonies of dissolution, I invite the aid of her worthiest sons.

I speak for the Union; that sacred temple which our fathers modelled into proportion, and delivered to us, only as a deposit for posterity. To this Union, rudely shaken by foreign war and intestine disorder, threatened with utter destruction by the weakness and madness of those very men appointed to guard and preserve it, I would ask the watchful care of all its friends.

I speak for the Constitution of our country, written and hallowed by the founders of our nation. To this Constitution, soiled as it has been, by the boorish hands of ignorant politicians, deformed as it has been by the tinkering projects of sciolists, daily trampled on by the fiery zealots of party, I would, even yet, point as a sacred thing, and most earnestly ask, is it not worth preserving?

Sir, the Constitution, the Union, the country, cannot be saved, but by immediate and powerful exertion. What is in truth our condition?

In the third year of a war, declared in vain defiance, and with ignorant gasconade, you at length find all your means and all your efforts inadequate even for defence. In the nature of things, this war has become entirely defensive; and happy shall we be, happy beyond all our hopes, if by any exertion we shall be able to defend from invasion the very soil where, but forty years ago, the banner of independence first floated in the breeze. So far in the nature of things is conquest beyond our power, that, in the next Summer, all the means of the nation, all the bravery of the people, and all the energies of the Government, will be indispensable to preserve our cities from conflagration, our States from subjugation, our Government from dissolution.

As a first and indispensable requisite to these objects, we turn to the Treasury, and there the most appalling views are presented. We find it empty, approaching bankruptcy. All confidence in the promises of Government is gone; and public credit has become a spectre haunting the place where it once had flourished.

In this situation, any supply from any existing resource is utterly hopeless. Such in brief is the state of our finances; on the sombre picture I will not enlarge; the portrait is indeed disgusting. That it does not in any shade belie the original, I appeal to the faithful and forlorn sketch, presented in the letter of Mr. Secretary Dallas, this morning read to the House. Sir, it is folly to talk of defence, it is madness to hope the preservation of the Union, unless your credit can be revived, your finances restored, and your Treasury replenished.

The great object of the Federal Union was the "common defence." If you finally fail in this grand object, the end for which the Federal Government was established, is wholly abandoned. Can you wonder, then, if the States, forced to defend themselves, shall seize the first opportunity to dissolve a Government, efficient for the destruction of their peace and prosperity, but wholly unable to avert one evil which its weak or rash conduct has brought upon them?

Money is not only the sinew of war. In modern times, it is the mainspring of every machine of Government. It is the sinew of our Union; and if your Treasury shall become finally and irretrievably bankrupt, the grand ligament of the States is severed, and we are lost as a nation.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the honest convictions of my mind. Can I hesitate, then, to vote for any just and Constitutional plan, which, in my judgment, will provide a revenue so indispensable for the defence of my country? Can I hesitate to vote for any practical and Constitutional measures, which will fairly promise to revive credit, improve the public finances, and replenish the Treasury?

The general plan of the Secretary of the Treasury, in my judgment, embraces the only practical measures which afford a rational prospect of either temporary or permanent relief. He has proposed to revive and sustain public credit by the only means now within our reach. We are to resort no longer to those popularity-hunting measures, those vicious expedients for revenue, which have produced the overthrow of our finances, and all but ruin to our country.

We are no longer to be satisfied with vain and fabulous statutes, with high-sounding titles, professing "the payment of the whole national debt," but proving in the end delusive and wicked. The "moral sense" of the nation—that worn out hack of our unfledged financiers—is not again dressed up to delude the nation, and insult its creditors. The ample resources of the country, its money and its capital, are now to constitute the pledge; a pledge which, in other countries, has proved an unbending and durable pillar of public credit; and which, if promptly made, and faithfully continuing, will, in our own, prove its restorer and abiding supporter.

These are the wise and only means to revive and sustain our credit recommended by the Secretary; and, entirely unknown as he is to me, I will not withhold from him the praise which I think he merits for the fidelity and intrepidity with which he has performed this unpopular, but great and indispensable duty. But, so roughly has public credit been treated by the financial quacks who preceded him, so long has it been the victim of patent nostrums and cancer doctors, that it has languished almost to the grave. With the most skilful treatment, its recovery to health and vigor must be slow and protracted. By the report from the Secretary, in unison with the report from his predecessor, it is certain, that to comply with your contracts during the present quarter, you have yet unprovided a supply of thirteen millions of dollars. This must be promptly obtained, or the operations of the Treasury are arrested, and your Government is dissolved.

How is this sum to be obtained? Not by loans, in the present condition of the stock market and of your credit. You have now in the market, at least, forty millions of stock, reduced in price to seventy-five or eighty per cent. While this stock continues in the market, at this depressed value, no loan can be contracted; or, if it can, upon no better terms than the market value of this stock. The only practical remedy is to remove this stock from the market, or, by some act of yours, to raise its value, and thus to deliver the Treasury from an insuperable bar to a new loan. The general measures for the revival of credit to which I have before alluded might finally accomplish this necessary work. But it is apparent they would accomplish it too late to afford any present relief to the Treasury. Hence, in anticipation of these measures, some plan, competent to obtain the object, seems to be indispensable.

For this purpose and to accomplish this object, it is presumed, was one of the views of the Secretary in the plan of a bank, which he has projected and recommended to the House. Is the plan so entirely chimerical, as has been represented? By authorizing a subscription of this depressed stock to such a bank, you would raise its value in the market, and thus relieve the Government, in contracting a new loan, from all competition with it. You would do more; you would relieve the capitalists and banks from the heavy load which now presses them to the earth, and you would inspire them with both the disposition and the ability to aid you in another loan. In the meantime your general plan of finance for the revival of your credit would be felt in the community. And if it should answer the hopes of all; if it should revive confidence, and restore the credit of the nation, you might then proceed to contract new loans to the extent of the ability of the country. It is in this way, in my apprehension, Mr. Speaker, that the bank proposed by the Secretary would afford the prompt relief so indispensable to the Treasury. I do not perceive in it those visionary qualities which have been so liberally ascribed to it. In every respect, I deem it preferable to its rival and substitute, now on your table. But, sir, we have been told that these are the mere visions of imagination. My friend from North Carolina (Mr. GASTON) has told us, that the war stock will still remain in the market; that its conversion into bank stock will be idle and illusory, because it will still press upon the country, and meet the Government in every attempt at another loan. Mr. Speaker, this objection is founded on the notion that the stock itself, and not the depressed price of it, is the obstruction to the Government; directly the reverse, I believe to be the state of the fact. I would ask my friend whether, if this stock, even in its present condition, could be elevated to its par value, there would be any difficulty in contracting another loan? He has not pretended there would be any. Surely, then, if the bank be of any value, the subscribable quality attached to the stock must raise its price, and although its character be only changed, and it remain as bank stock in the country, the object is accomplished, the road is clear to the Government for another loan, and the Treasury is relieved.

The gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) perceiving this obvious conclusion, attempted to fortify the objection of my honorable friend. He declared that the surplus capital of the country was exhausted; therefore it was, and not because your credit was shaken, that the stocks already created found no purchasers; and their price, like that of any other commodity with which the market is surcharged, has fallen. And hence he contended that though, by the plan of the Secretary, the price of the stock would be raised, yet all efforts for another loan would be hopeless.

Mr. Speaker, if this opinion of the honorable gentleman be well founded, then indeed have we a prospect before us, dark in the extreme.

I will not detain the House to examine the position. Perhaps it is impossible, from the data we here possess, to arrive at any certain conclusion upon the subject. The honorable gentleman has not attempted to sustain it by facts or reasoning. He has advanced it as a mere hypothesis. I shall content myself with avowing my firm belief, that it is an hypothesis without foundation. It is not that your loaning capital is exhausted, but that the confidence of the capitalist in your wisdom, integrity, and policy, is entirely departed. It is not that no surplus capital remains unemployed in the country, but, that your credit has sunk so low that they who hold it will not confide it to your faithless hands. That this is the fact, is proven by events daily presented to our view. The States have no difficulty in procuring loans to any extent which their exigencies demand. Even your towns and cities are intrusted with millions. At the very time that the Secretary of the Treasury was advertising the credit of the Government, and calling, in vain, for money upon terms and conditions the most extravagant and ruinous, your cities had but to open their subscriptions, and millions were at once obtained upon the ordinary and legal premiums. Do you want other proof, Mr. Speaker, that the hypothesis of the honorable gentleman is utterly unfounded, and therefore that his objection is entirely fanciful?

If I am mistaken in this, sir, then I admit the objection to be conclusive and fatal to the plan of the Secretary. But does not the honorable gentleman perceive that his objection is equally fatal to his own system? that he has presented a dilemma, on the horn of which, his own offspring must hang and surely perish?

If the capital of the country is exhausted; if the market is already saturated with public stock, will the gentleman tell me, what is to become of the Treasury notes which his plan is to pour forth in a stream of millions? Through what magical process is it, that after they have fluttered their hour on the public stage, they are to transport themselves into six per cent. stock, and settle quietly into the vaults of his mammoth bank? If the surplus capital is exhausted, if all is already gone, the process is utterly impossible. Surely the remorseless hand of the parent has wrung the neck from his own bantling.

I stop not here, sir. If this hypothesis be correct, why are you contriving novel schemes for the revival of public credit? Why a sinking fund? Why a pledge of taxes? Abandon all this unwieldy apparatus of financial machinery. You have it seems mistaken the seat of the disorder. You are applying plasters to the head, when you should be administering tonics to the stomach; you are bleeding and blistering a body politic already exhausted. Quit at once all this quackery; take the opinion of this learned doctor. Your credit is in full health—it needs no physician; the capital of the nation alone languishes! Restore, then, to the nation her life blood, the vital principle of her prosperity; restore her commerce, her agriculture, her peace. This is your only remedy—the only prescription which can rescue her from dissolution and the grave.

Mr. Speaker, with my friend from New York, (Mr. OAKLEY,) I am ready to say that this is the only effectual remedy remaining in your hands. Peace, and peace alone, can staunch the deep and bleeding wounds of our country. But, until that blessed messenger shall arrive "with healing in his wings," we have nothing left but our own arm for defence and preservation. If the hypothesis of the gentleman be correct, that arm has become too feeble for any purpose of safety. Attempt not to stretch it forth; its form is destroyed; its strength is withered; its very sinews are blasted.

I have hitherto fondly hoped that this nation, even under her present Government, was amply competent to her own defence; that, palsied as she is by the councils of rashness and of folly, her own energies would burst spontaneously forth, and strike to the earth even the gigantic enemy who meditates her ruin. But if the hypothesis of the honorable gentleman is correct, my fond hopes are ended. If all your surplus capital is gone, this war must close on any terms, or the union of these States must follow it. For vain will be the attempt to wrest, by oppressive taxes, from the industry and the annual income of the people, those annual millions, which defence itself will annually consume. But, sir, I hope, and I believe better things of our condition. I believe we have capital still remaining to be loaned; and that nothing is necessary but the prompt and vigorous application of the means yet within our reach to bring that capital to the immediate relief of the Treasury.

Mr. Speaker—another, and the prime object of a bank, is to furnish a circulating medium for the nation. We have not, we never had a currency of gold and silver, which ever approached a sufficiency for the business of the country. Banks, incorporated by the States, have issued paper, which for twenty years has constituted the great mass of our circulating medium. By means of the National Bank, which three years ago was immolated at the shrine of party resentment, the General Government retained an indirect, though inadequate influence over this State paper. But from the period when that bank was dissolved, this country has exhibited the monstrous absurdity of a Government "charged with the care of the integrity and prosperity of the Empire, without any direct or indirect control over its 'currency.'" What has been the consequence? These State institutions, in no way responsible to you, have so managed as to render the currency of the nation suspected and uncertain, and thus have embarrassed all your fiscal measures.

No loan can be paid you, but in this State paper. On this side of New England, as has been demonstrated by my friend from New Hampshire, (Mr. WEBSTER,) this paper has depreciated to an alarming extent. In the very inception of a loan you have the certainty of a loss to the full amount of this depreciation. From the loss of confidence in these State institutions, and from the limited circulation of the paper, you encounter almost insuperable embarrassments in its expenditure.

Paper issued from banks south of the Potomac, and west of the Alleghanies, is almost worthless north of the Delaware. The notes of Maryland and Pennsylvania produce to you enormous losses, and even bank bills of the North must be paid out within a day's journey of the bank which issues them, or the same consequences follow. In this situation, it must be obvious, that a national currency, equal in value throughout the country, and founded on a competent capital, is a sine qua non to any system of loaning, which will not produce ruin to the country.

Whether the plan of the Secretary can furnish such a currency, is certainly problematical; perhaps the case is at present without remedy. In this country it is an untried experiment. But I have no hesitation in averring, that I think it to the full as likely to attain this great and desirable object, as the novel system on your table, which has become its substitute.

Mr. Speaker, when I speak of the plan of the Secretary, I would not be understood as embracing all its details. In relation to those details, I accord in opinion with my friend from North Carolina (Mr. GASTON;) I consider them erroneous in every view. The appointment of five directors by the President, the total prohibition of the sale of the stock, the compulsory loan of thirty millions to the Government, and the arbitrary power reposed in the President, to compel a suspension of specie payment, are in my opinion, features which deform the plan, and will prove the most inveterate enemies to its success. On this subject, I think, not a man can doubt, who attended to the conclusive reasoning of my honorable friend. It would but diminish its irresistible force, for me to attempt to fortify his eloquent argument. I rejoice, sir, that those details have been stricken from the bill; and as they are equally inconsistent with the principles and the successful operation of the former plan, as they are with that on the table, I most sincerely trust they will never be suffered to accompany any system which shall receive the sanction of this House.

Before I quit this part of the subject, I beg the attention of the House to a topic which I consider of no little importance, as it relates as well to the justice as the permanent fiscal policy of this Government. I mean, sir, the interests and claims of the holders of the stock, which the Secretary proposes to place in the bank.

Mr. Speaker; when I speak of these men, I speak of gentlemen, few of whom are known to me—I hold them, like all other men, "enemies in war, in peace friends."

In no way, am I partial to them. On the contrary, I have no doubt that the pecuniary aids, which they have furnished for the prosecution of this war, have proved most injurious to our country. If they had withheld their aid, the storm of war must have ceased to roll onward; and peace, an honorable and advantageous peace, would long since have blessed the nation. A peace, to which at this moment every member of the Administration would think it happiness to fly, from the evils which are accumulating on their guilty heads.

It is not wonderful, therefore, that the honorable friends who sit around me should regard the conduct of these gentlemen with disapprobation, and look to their claims with coldness, if not with antipathy. Yet, sir, they are the legal creditors of the nation, entitled to the same justice and equity with those who became creditors before them. And if I am sure of anything, depending on the judgment of man, it is this: that whatever may be the feelings of my honorable friends, those feelings will not for a moment be suffered to control their conduct, upon a question of such vital and permanent consequence to the nation.

NOVEMBER, 1814.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

But, sir, I would ask the authors and supporters of the war on this floor, how it consists with the plain principles of gratitude and honor for them to treat these creditors with reproach or their claims with indifference?

They relied on loans to keep in motion their whole machinery of Government and war. To procure these loans, all the arts of persuasion and remonstrance were played off upon the public; "lives and fortune and sacred honor" men stood aloof—the whole machinery of war was disordered, and about to run down.

In these critical moments, these men stepped forth and saved you from disgrace abroad, and indignation at home. They went to the very top of the market in their offers. True, the conditions were disgraceful to you and injurious to your country; but let them not be blamed for this, for prudent men even then believed, that, by giving you their property on any terms, they exhibited a lunacy or folly amply sufficient to consign them to the care of a guardian or conservator. Under these circumstances, is it for you to reproach them—you, to whose interests they have devoted their fortunes, all but their honor? Is such the Republican gratitude of modern times and of modern politicians?

When it has been stated that the bill on your table would, by the new and enormous issue of Treasury notes, produce the ruin of these men, it has been coolly answered—are we their guardians? Are we responsible for their ruin? Are we bound to more than a strict compliance with the terms of our contract? An honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. LOWNDES,) with unusual ability and eloquence, has attempted to prove that this bill violates neither the justice or equity to which they are entitled.

With that honorable gentleman, so well qualified as he is to decide this question, not only by the strong powers of intellect, but by those lofty and honorable feelings which adorn his character, I am unwilling to disagree. I would yield much to his opinion.

Strict justice and equity, perhaps, require no more of us than a rigid compliance with the terms of our contract. But as we have not contracted to furnish a bank for the reception of stock, nor to refrain from an emission of Treasury notes, we may, perhaps, refuse the former, and perform the latter, without any violation of our faith. Certainly we may do so, if, upon a candid view of the whole ground, the safety of the State or the essential interests of the people shall require either at our hands.

But I would ask that honorable gentleman, if, in deciding on the course which the faith and interests of the country require, nothing else is to be taken into consideration than the mere terms of our contracts? Is it not the first dictate of justice and generosity, that you should pass beyond the legal forms of your contracts, and take especial care that those who have confided their fortunes to your faith, from which there can be no appeal, should not be ruined by any course of fiscal policy which you may resolve to pursue? If this be not so—yet, I would again ask the honorable gentleman, are there not considerations of higher import, and more durable consequence, which you must respect? I mean the permanent interests of the nation itself.

In modern times, loans are the great and only resources of Government in their wars. Without a resort to the system of loaning, in some form, not a Government of modern Europe would have survived the universal tempest which has shaken them all to their deepest foundations. To preserve such a resource to a Government, the course of her fiscal policy must regard the interests of her creditors, and speak undoubted security to those who possess the surplus capital of the country.

In this important science, it is not degrading to receive the lessons of experience, even from our enemy. The credit and the finances of England had languished for nearly a century, under the influence of a fiscal machine called a Sinking Fund, not unlike our own miserable institution, having the same name, for the last twelve years.

In the year 1784, when Mr. Pitt became the financial minister of England, he found her finances in a state of rapid decline, not unlike our own at the present period. Her credit was impaired; her stocks consequently low; a debt of enormous amount, and daily increasing; without sufficient revenue to discharge the annual dividends as they became due to the creditors. Instantly, resolving to triumph over every difficulty, he risked his popularity and his place, that he might perform the great duties which he owed his country. He increased the taxes, funded the floating claims on the Treasury, and adopted safe and energetic rules for organizing the finances.

In the year 1786 he established a sinking fund, on principles which promised undoubted success. But, in the year 1792, upon the suggestion of his great rival, he introduced into his system that grand improvement in finance which will render his name as immortal as the fame of his country. Henceforward, under each loan, taxes were to be placed and inviolably pledged, sufficient annually to discharge the interest, and one per cent. upon its principal, until its entire extinction should be accomplished. By this improvement, not the slightest departure from which has ever been allowed, the creditors of England have become annuitants, and her loan annuities determinable, at periods more or less distant, according to the price of stocks in the market.

But this acknowledged chieftain of modern financiers did not stop here. He knew that the capitalists of the country, who were also her creditors, were his only sure resource in times of national alarm. Their interests were cherished in all his fiscal policy; they were constantly consulted in the formation of all his plans; and his measures were arranged upon principles of an enlarged policy, embracing in its scope, what he considered inseparably connected, the interest of the creditor and the public credit of his country. Hence it was, that though the black cloud of destruction hovered over his island for twenty years; in the darkest hours of a long, eventful, and mortal struggle, in which his country was engaged for her existence; even in that day of despair, when the colossal tyrant of France arrayed his myriad of slaves, and threatened to pour them across the Channel, he never for a moment lost the confidence of the capitalists of his country, but was always able to elicit supplies equal to his wants, and on conditions moderate and advantageous.

Mr. Speaker, if you would preserve to your Government a similar resource, pursue the example of this great minister; and then, though this war should continue, and tenfold darkness should settle on your prospects, you will fasten to your interests a body of men able and willing to succor you in the day of your deepest distress.

But, sir, what a cold and sickening contrast does your policy present. Like "the Jew of Venice," you refer all to "your bond." Your "bond" becomes the substitute for your judgment—the rigid test of your justice and gratitude. When, standing on the very verge of ruin, your creditors cry to you for preservation; you point to the bond, and in cool triumph ask, "is it there written?" They show you that your policy is their total destruction, and invoke you to spare them; you point to your contract, and exclaim, "Here is our warrant. We have a right to a pound of flesh, and we will have it, though your heart's blood shall stream upon the knife."

Go on, Mr. Speaker: Perhaps, in these days of disorder, policy and justice are no more inseparable. It is possible that, in the vicissitudes of modern times, human nature has, also, been revolutionized. If so, your policy may be well adapted to the actual condition of things. Go on, sir; it may be that the mind of man is no longer influenced by the same motives—excited by the same objects, as in former days. It is possible that experience has become a mere idle babbling, and history an instrument of deception. If so, your course may prove triumphant. It is possible that, with the clamors of thousands whom you have ruined sounding in your ears, you may pass at once to the destruction of other thousands. But, sir, believe me, if "man is yet man," with the destruction you will now work will end your power of mischief. Do not believe—be not madmen enough to hope—that after you shall have coolly perpetrated the ruin of your present creditors, you will find others, idiots enough, to throw their fortunes within "the scope of your policy."

I turn now, sir, to a particular examination of the bill before you. The bank to be incorporated by this bill, is modelled on the novel plan of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN;) and its objects are the same as were those, intended by that, for which it has become a substitute. Indeed, with the exception of the right of the Government to subscribe, which is stricken from this bill, the bank will present the same proportions of stock and specie, a capital of the same complexion and consistency, subject to the same objections, and in its operations opposed by the same obstacles which have been supposed conclusive against the success of the first project. The grand distinction between the two projects is this: The first plan relied on loans for the relief of Government, and was modelled for the purpose of rendering loans practicable. This plan renounces all hopes of future loans, and proposes, as a succedaneum, the issuing of twenty-four millions of Treasury notes. And on these notes alone is the Government to rely for present relief; and for all its supplies during the ensuing year. These Treasury notes are intended to range awhile through the country as a currency, pass into a solid mass of six per cent. stock, settle quietly and in full credit into the vaults of a bank; and, assuming there yet another shape, to flutter forth, and constitute another circulating medium. Sir, the process is captivating in theory, charming to the fancy; but, unless I am much mistaken, it is one of those splendid visions which the noble science of alchemy has often produced, to mortify the pride and disappoint the hopes of man. It has no practicable qualities, and the danger is, that while you are pursuing the unsubstantial vision, admiring its varied colors, and fanciful forms, the mighty bubble will burst, and leave you in the midst of mortification and despair.

It will be perceived, Mr. Speaker, that should these Treasury notes make their grand tour ever so brilliantly, before they arrive at the vaults of the bank they settle down into stock, just like the stock now existing, of no more value in itself, and combining no superior qualities. And therefore it was that I stated, when this bank shall have passed its periods of danger, and issued forth a full grown bank, it will be in no wise better calculated to aid the Government or furnish a national currency, than a bank formed of the stock already existing. In this respect, the two plans are upon a level. It is to the process, to which I have above alluded, that I object, as illusory, and highly dangerous to the country. Your Treasury notes never can be kept at par; they will probably never reach the bank at all; and if they do so, it will be after they have scourged the land by a dreadful depreciation, and through the ruin of thousands who shall hold them.

Let it not be forgotten, that the adoption of this plan precludes all hopes of contracting loans; indeed, it professes to become an entire substitute for the system of loaning. In three months from the passing this bill, the whole twenty-four millions must issue forth, like the locusts of Egypt, to scourge the land. For the supplies even of the present quarter, your Treasury must obtain thirteen millions of dollars, or your contracts must all be violated. During the first quarter of the next year you can expect but little aid from taxes; yet your armies must be recruited and paid. Preparations of vast magnitude for the next Summer must be made; for then you must engage in a mortal struggle, upon the issue of which you have placed the existence of the country. The issuing of these notes will be your only resource. Loans, I repeat it, will be out of the question. You not only will have left the present stock a massive drug in the market, pressing to the earth the moneyed men of the country, but you will have added to its weight by masses of new stock in the form of Treasury notes. In the nature of things, therefore, you will be bound to issue all the notes in your power to put forth. Do you imagine that they can be circulated at par upon your credit alone? Those who believe so, have but little knowledge of the worthless state of public credit. They have not seen the contractors tremble, the merchants frown, the farmers scowl, and the speculators laugh, at the very name of public credit. Sir, such an expectation is utterly fallacious.

Of all paper, Government bills are the most unfit for a circulating medium. I might read from the pages of the great founder of your whole financial system, arguments conclusive, to show the wide difference between a paper medium, depending upon the faith of Government alone, and that which is founded on the capital of a private bank. The former has no bounds to its issue, but the discretion which generally becomes another name for the exigencies of the Government. It is always suspected, always received with doubt and hesitation, and, therefore, always depreciates. While the latter, founded on solid capital, always protected, regulated, and restrained by the honor and integrity of the directors, fortified by the interest of the stockholders and the existence of the bank, all of which are jeopardized by an over issue, comes to the public with the strongest title to their confidence, and is generally received and circulated. The works of the lamented Hamilton are now before me; I will not detain the House, but refer them to his argument upon this interesting subject.

If these objections in the general are well founded, it does appear to me, that the peculiar qualities of the paper contemplated by this bill, will render it a mere burlesque on the very name of a circulating medium. Experience has proved that it is essential, perhaps a sine qua non, to a circulating medium, that it should bear its value on its face. It cannot be clogged with qualities, which render calculations of its worth a pre-requisite to its daily circulation. But these notes are to bear an interest of five and three-quarters per cent.; their value will vary with each passing day. Can a currency thus encumbered pass freely along, through the illiterate classes of the community? No, sir, it is fit only for a nation of mathematicians; and if you issue them, every farmer must have at his elbow a Zerah Colbourn to carry on the ordinary transactions of society.

To surmount these difficulties, however, the honorable gentleman proposes a resort to the tricks of the Treasury. This paper, and this alone, shall be received in taxes. Mr. Speaker, this expedient may be ingenious, but in my opinion, like the rest of the machine, it is wholly impracticable. Your Treasury notes never will be sufficiently diffused to furnish the people with a medium in which to pay the taxes. Besides, sir, such a plan, if successful, would drive back to its vaults the notes of every State bank, and render their charters nearly worthless. Hence, sir, in self-defence, to preserve their existence, you would force the State banks into a combination to resist and defeat a measure which would produce their ruin. They would all refuse your notes. The great body of influential citizens, interested in the preservation of the State banks, would be arrayed against you. Your notes might pay taxes, but good care would be taken that they should pay nothing else. In such a struggle your defeat would be certain. Distraction would be introduced into your medium; its circulation would be impeded, and an indefinite depreciation would leave you to lament the injustice of your attempt.

Mr. Speaker, never was such a circulating medium issued and sustained at par, under similar circumstances, by any Government. I would appeal to the experience of European Governments; I would remind you of the assignats of France, at the mention of which, justice frowns and policy blushes—I would appeal to your own experience.

It might be improper to point to the close of our Revolution, to describe the mere spectre of public credit which survived, and the consequent destruction of the Government paper which filled the country. But look at the few Treasury notes which are now abroad; they are receivable in taxes; they are shortly due at the Treasury; yet you may purchase them in the market, from five to twenty per cent. under their par value. Let gentlemen read their errors in their own experience.

But, Mr. Speaker, the honorable gentleman did not much rely on these expedients to sustain his system. The bank was his grand and final reliance; the bank is the stay and staff of his plan. This bank is to act as a kind of alchymical engine, by which worthless paper is to be turned into gold, the sickly credit of the nation restored to health, and the mighty operations of the Government and of the war sustained and regulated. And this wonderful engine is to work in this wise: The books of the bank are to be opened, and the flood of paper, as it rushes from the Treasury, is to flow rapidly, and regularly, and monthly, into the reservoir, just as the deep and placid current of a mighty river flows to the bosom of the ocean.

Suppose, Mr. Speaker, the river should meet some unsurmountable obstruction cast across its channel, its smooth course should be interrupted, and its flood should be beaten back towards its source. It would rush from its bed, roll over the fields which before it had nourished, and leave the country a stagnant pool, charged with pestilence and death. So, sir, if in the vicissitudes to which all mortal projects are exposed, this flood of paper should be obstructed in its course, it would settle down upon the community, full of the seeds of fiscal pestilence and ruin.

My honorable friend from New York, (Mr. OAKLEY,) perceiving this danger, and its obvious consequences, thinks there is a remedy within our reach. By legislative acts, he would have the Government so restricted that they should issue this paper no faster than it should be able to pass into the bank, and then the danger would be averted. Does not my honorable friend perceive, that the invention of such a provision would render the whole project a felo de se? When you have adopted this system, and voluntarily abandoned all hopes of loans, you will have no resort for supplies but to this Treasury paper; in truth, when you enter on this plan there is no retreat. "You set your life upon a throw, and you must stand the hazard of the die." According to the exigencies of the Government you must continue to issue your paper, and, if the bank fails to receive it, the evils I have described are inevitable. If there is reasonable doubt upon the subject, you ought to pause long, and reflect well, before you hazard the venture. What is it you put at hazard? Not your bank alone, but all the character and credit that remains to you; all preparation for the deadly struggle which awaits you. If there is much hazard in the game, you are made to place your life upon the issue. Should you lose, all is lost; the dissolution of the Union—the subjugation of the States are consummated. In solemn truth, Mr. Speaker, the chances are all against you; not one doubt of your loss remains in my mind.

May I ask, said Mr. G., how these bills are ever to escape from the Treasury into circulation? Think you that capitalists will buy them of you at anything like their par value? Will you put them forth as a currency under par; thus stamping them with the image of death before they issue from the womb? Nothing of this is practicable. No, sir, if they go forth at all, they must pass to your contractors, your commissaries, your soldiers, and your sailors—to any of your creditors who prefer your paper to your parol promise. Hence, it is possible they may pass to others, and thus obtain a partial circulation among the merchants, farmers, and mechanics.

But, sir, are we deluded enough to expect that these men will place them in the bank? All their active capital is necessary for their ordinary pursuits; essential to put in motion and extract profit from their own fixed property. To establish banks, is as far removed from all their views and objects as it is inimical to their pursuits and interests. Sometimes, when a bank has been long established, and has gained reputation for prudent management, this class of men do invest small sums in its stocks, both for profit and security; but never do you find them, to any material extent, risking their hard-earned fortunes in speculations novel and uncertain.

When I heard the honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) dilating upon the wide diffusion of these notes, whereby the farmers of the North and the South, and the East and the West, would be furnished with an opportunity to participate in this great national speculation, I could consider it in no other light than as a rhetorical flourish to attract favor to his project; I considered it as a mere "springe to catch woodcocks." And the House must have been amused to observe how suddenly the honorable delegate from Missouri (Mr. EASTON) was noosed. He actually prevailed on the House to open a subscription, somewhere in the forests of the West, near, as I am informed, the fur settlement on Columbia river.

Mr. Speaker, I could not but be diverted at the amusing little contest upon this subject, between the honorable gentleman from South Carolina and his friend from Vermont (Mr. FISK.) The latter gentleman did not hesitate to declare that he saw the ruin of his party lurking in the provisions of this bill. "Why," said he, "the capitalists alone can buy the Treasury notes and form the bank. Those who belong to the Administration are exhausted. The Federalists will therefore get the bank, and with it dash out the brains of the Administration." And he threatened to take his hat, make his bow, and bid good night to the Administration, sooner than to stay here and be blown up by this gunpowder institution.

The honorable gentleman from South Carolina rose to quiet the apprehensions of his friend. He seemed to agree that the capitalists attached to the Administration might have been somewhat surfeited with the paper notions they had too liberally swallowed; but he assured his friend that one sure resource remained to the party.—"Have we not," he exclaimed, "the rich yeomanry of the country on our side? Are they not the pride and boast of our party? And will not our yeomanry aid our loans, and assist in the establishment of our bank?"

And he seemed to conclude, that his friend might safely let his hat hang on its nail, and continue to sit and to vote, until something more substantial should "push him from his stool." The gentleman from Vermont, though evidently puzzled by this bold appeal, appeared to me not entirely satisfied. I saw a smile on his face, which seemed contemptuously to say: "Yes, yes, we have the rich yeomanry with us; and they have their cotton fields and their corn fields, but will they convert them into loans? They also have their pigs and their poultry, but will they place them in your bank?" Sir, the plain practical common sense of the gentleman from Vermont taught him, that all the talk about the wide diffusion of this Treasury paper, to afford opportunities to our farmers to subscribe to the bank, was the airy creation of inexperience and enthusiasm.

Does the gentleman from South Carolina, indeed, expect any material aid in establishing his bank from this worthy class of our citizens? The experience of this war should correct his error. Your late loans were authorized to support this just and necessary war; to prosecute your holy crusade against the Canadas. Of course, every motive of patriotism would impel "our yeomanry" to step forth with all their means. Your Government called loudly for the aid of its friends. Was its voice heard by "our yeomanry?" Let the gentleman step to the Treasury, and see how much of the late loan has been taken by the plain farmers of Kentucky, the proud planters of Carolina, the lords of the soil of Virginia? He will find a beggarly account of pitiful subscriptions.

Even now, sir, when your Treasury contains not one dollar, when this honest and glorious war is about to expire, merely for want of nourishment, where are these patriotic supporters of Administration? You have loans unfilled—your Government in tones of deep anguish call for succor, and yet "our rich yeomanry," who are able to invest millions in bank stock, are nowhere to be found. They abandoned their leaders and their war in this their darkest and most perilous hour.

Did I believe that these men were exclusively supporters of this war, and that they had the ability to furnish aid, I should view them as the most sordid of mankind. But believing directly the reverse, and not having a doubt that the surplus capital, which must create loans and bank stock, rests with them but in a very limited extent, they are subject to no reproach. It is their part, to perform their political duties with fidelity, and to wrestle morning and evening with their God, to deliver their country from its two most dreadful scourges, the war and the authors of the war.

Mr. Speaker, the capitalists of the country must convert the Treasury paper into bank stock, or it will remain unconverted. By capitalists, I mean those enterprising men who have accumulated masses of active and surplus capital, for the purpose of venturing it in great and advantageous speculations.

Have these men, at this time, the ability to perform the process? You have nothing to hope from New England. Her citizens have their money and their capital safe at home; and you will not find them idiots enough, in this tempestuous season, to venture it on the ocean, in any vessel that you can build and rig and navigate. From the capitalists south of the Hudson, and from them only, must you expect aid. It is a mistake to suppose the depressed war stock to be in few hands. The original contractors retain, comparatively, but trifling portions of the whole mass. It is widely diffused among these capitalists, and unless, by some act of yours, its market value is elevated, it will paralyze all their efforts to afford any aid to your project.

The banks, too, are groaning under the weight of this depressed stock. They have received it in pledges and in payment. It lies useless in their vaults, and clogs even their operations. I have not a doubt of the fact, that from this cause, more than any other, they have been forced to suspend their specie payments. And, I think, nothing is hazarded in saying, that they never will resume them, until this cause shall be removed.

But, Mr. Speaker, if we grant the ability, shall we find the disposition? What are the inducements for any man to purchase your notes at par, and place them in the bank? Is there any profit to justify the speculation? Sir, if the friends of this bank are at all accurate in their descriptions of it, instead of inviting, it will deter any prudent man from venturing money in it.

The gentleman from South Carolina thinks it will be at first a weak institution, capable of performing but little business; that it must slowly feel its way, discounting cautiously, and he hopes, by such a course, it may survive its infancy. My friend from New York (Mr. OAKLEY) says, it is strictly a six million bank, and to that capital must its business be limited. And my friend from New Hampshire (Mr. WEBSTER) has no doubt it will perish by the draining of its specie, if it should issue paper equal to one-half of its specie capital. If these gentlemen are near the truth, then it is indeed a poor bank—a very beggarly institution, well calculated to devour capital, but with a wretched capacity to return profit. To obtain dividends on six millions of capital, it is supposed that men of fortune will be so weak as to convert twenty-four millions of property into six per cent. stock, and lay it by in the vaults of the bank, safe to be sure, but almost wholly unproductive! Such fanciful hopes can never be realized.

But my friend from New York has remarked, that in this respect the two plans are on a precise level. If there would be no adequate inducement for moneyed men to invest their property in this bank, neither would there be for the holders of the present stock to invest it in the bank recommended by the Secretary. My honorable friend has not treated this subject with his usual sagacity.

The cases are entirely dissimilar. And so are the motives, which would excite to investments in the different banks. The present holders of the stocks are already committed. Their stock is now a drug in their hands. It threatens them with ruin. The motive they would have to comply with the terms of the bill, and obtain specie, would be, therefore, strong and irresistible—the elevation of the price of their stock, the rescue of themselves from ruin. In the present case there is no such motive. Here no risk is already incurred. The only motive is a profitable speculation—the only inducement, positive gain. It is apparent, that while on the Secretary's plan the present holders of stock would fly to the bank as a refuge from ruin, on the present plan, the nature of the institution might, and probably would, forbid any capitalist from approaching it.

If, in peaceful and prosperous times, this bank might present a fair speculation, and obtain ample subscriptions; yet, can it be hoped, that prudent men would venture their fortunes in it, in these times of dismay and peril? Look around,

H. OF R.

Bank of the United States.

NOVEMBER, 1814.

sir. From abroad, invasion is menaced of every part of your extended coast. Our cities, the great depositories of our surplus wealth, have but feeble assurance of safety. The storms of war are beating on our country from every quarter of the heavens. What is our condition at home? The foul spirit of party sits like a bloated incubus upon the Cabinet, and turns all its counsels to rashness and folly. Like the fabled Gorgon, this foul fiend daily mounts this very Capitol, and scattering the snakes of discord among the people, he calls them, in tones of fury, to civil commotion and bloody violence. The Constitution has received deep, perhaps mortal wounds. War, in his iron chariot, is rolling through the land, crushing, with its heavy wheels, our civil institutions, those bulwarks of civil liberty. The Government totters from untimely decrepitude. And the very temple of our Union, toppled from its base, is ready to be dashed to the earth, and to leave the country encumbered with its fragments. This country resembles the strong man filled with wine, his head full of delirious visions, and mad projects of ambition and vengeance, revolving vast projects, and deciding on prompt and vigorous exertion; but his limbs are palsied, his nerves are withered, and he lies, supine on the earth, huge, disgusting, and impotent.

To what fate we are destined is unknown to man. We have been borne along to our destruction almost with the rapidity of the lightning. And it is not for human foresight ever to conjecture whether the God of our fathers has finally forsaken us, and whether the end of our Republic is at hand. In such "crazy times," think you that men, who possess sane minds, will embark their fortunes in any vessel whose safety depends on such commanders, such pilots, and such a crew as you can furnish?

But, Mr. Speaker, suppose I am mistaken in all this. If there are men able and willing to purchase the Treasury paper and transmute it to bank stock—the very process of transmutation will be destructive to the country. Such men, if they exist at all, exist for the most part in our cities, and are closely connected by the strong band of common interest. In these moneyed operations, their interests lead them to act united and in concert. What will be their conduct in this business?

Finding your Treasury notes wholly unsupported, and beginning to descend, they will leave them to take their downward course. Nay, they will aid their descent, certain that they will remain at all times within the reach of their coin. The strong interests of these men will impel them to such a course, and they will surely pursue it. And thus the whole machinery becomes disordered by the very agents upon whom you rely to keep it in motion. Immediately, and of necessity, your paper will greatly depreciate. Will the Government, then, suffer me to repeat the question, Will the Government then stop its issues? It has no alternative—the gate must continue hoisted, and the stream must continue running.

The very period has now arrived so eloquently deprecated by my honorable friend from North Carolina (Mr. GASTON.) Your contractors are clamorous—give them "assignats."

Your sailors demand their wages—out with a new edition of Treasury notes.

Your armies clamor for arrearages. Dare you refuse them? Remember the tragedy at Newburgh—it may be attempted in your day. There are Armstrongs still alive to excite rebellion, but no WASHINGTON remains to parry its fury and save the country. A new swarm of "assignats" will be the dreadful and the only remedy.

Your paper will rapidly reach its lowest point of depression. And now it is that the remorseless speculator will begin to prowl for his prey.

The war-worn soldier, as he halts slowly and painfully from Canada, must surrender the price of his blood for half its value.

The widow and the orphan of him who in your battles has laid his bones amid the snows of the North, must sacrifice their little all for a lean subsistence. Some of you witnessed, we all have read and have wept, the fate of the ruined soldiers of the Revolution. The same picture will be now presented, only on a larger canvass, and with more tragical coloring.

I appeal to those who belong to the dominant party. Have you forgotten the history of those days when the debt of our independence was funded? Your party then, with the present Chief Magistrate at its head, professed to be the soldier's friend and champion; and the country rung with your clamors for a discrimination of the debt. So strongly did you then profess to feel for the soldier, that you were ready to violate the most solemn contracts to save him from the loss of depreciated money. What is now your conduct? You are about to adopt a system which will bring the soldiers of your present armies to the same loss and the same condition. You are not contented even with this. In this bill, you consummate the whole transaction; you not only frame the engine by which the soldier may be defrauded, but you provide an asylum to which the agents who shall defraud him may fly with their spoils and set at defiance all human justice and power. You do not intend this crying iniquity.

No, when the crisis shall arrive, when your paper shall sink to half its nominal value, when, like voracious sharks prowling the ocean, the speculators shall range through every village, seizing the miserable victims of their cupidity, then will you step boldly forth, and cheered by the approving voice of the people, which now would thunder indignation against the measure, you would consummate your goodly work, by that unpardonable political sin a tender law. This bill will lay the sure foundation for such a measure.

I appeal to the friends who sit around me. Are you ready to support a system which will press on to this consummation of ruin, with a step "steady as time, certain as death?"

The plan of the Secretary may be vicious.

NOVEMBER, 1814.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

But if that be hurtful in detail, this is the very essence of ruin in its principles. If that would injure the country, this is the very box of Pandora, from which will surely issue the most dreadful evils which ever scourged and cursed a people. Better that our Republic be struck at once from "the great firmament of nations," than that she should linger a few months of rayless existence, and then plunge into such an abyss of embarrassment and misery.

Mr. Speaker, I may be mistaken in all these forebodings of evil. If the bill shall pass, and prove beneficial, my country will owe me no thanks for the boon. But if it shall produce the evils I have anticipated, here, in the face of the nation, I wash my hands of all the consequences.

When Mr. GROSVENOR concluded—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, assigning as a reason therefor his anxiety to expedite the public business, and proceed to the adoption of those measures which the times imperiously demand, required the previous question.

The call was sanctioned by a vote of 73 to 71; but some misapprehension of the question having taken place, a second count took place, after some little confusion, and there appeared to be 62 for the previous question, and 70 against it. So the call was not duly sanctioned.

After a few remarks from Mr. MACON and others, as to the effect of striking out the first section of the bill—which some appeared to think would have the effect to destroy the bill—

Mr. HANSON, to save difficulty in that respect, withdrew his motion to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON then renewed his demand of the previous question—which precludes all further amendment as well as debate—which demand was seconded by a vote of 62 to 59.

The previous question was then put in the following form, viz: "Shall the main question be now put?" and decided by yeas and nays. For the previous question 75, against it 67, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alston, Anderson, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bines, Brown, Caldwell, Cannon, Chappell, Clark, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Forney, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Humphreys, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irwin, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Leflerts, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Roa of Pennsylvania, Rich, Roane, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Tannehill, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Williams, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

The requisite number having required the main question to be put, it was put on the engrossing the bill for a third reading; and was decided in the negative. For the motion 49, against it 104, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Barnett, Bines, Bradley, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Chappell, Clark, Condict, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Duval, Earle, Findley, Forney, Gaston, Gourdin, Griffin, Harris, Hasbrouck, Irving, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Lowndes, McKee, McLean, Montgomery, Oakley, Pearson, Pickens, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rich, Robertson, Sevier, Sharp, Skinner, Smith of Virginia, Taylor, Ward of New Jersey, Winter, and Yancey.

So the House decided that the bill should not be read a third time—in other words, that it should be rejected.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, then rose, and said he had voted in the majority against the bill; and was, therefore, at liberty to move a reconsideration of the vote just taken. This motion he did make with a view to retain the bill still in possession of the House, in order to recommit it—that the House might not be deprived of an opportunity of passing a bank bill during the present session.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, observed, that he was opposed to the reconsideration of the vote which the House had just given. Gentlemen who favored the establishment of a National Bank, had urged a reconsideration, with a view to ascertain if they could not meet on some middle ground, and reconcile their conflicting opinions. Those who were in favor of a bank, but differed merely as to the details, might well vote for a reconsideration. Mr. M. said he was opposed to the establishment of any bank, and no shape could be given to it which could induce him to vote for it; and as the gentlemen who had spoken on the question had not taken a view of it, which precisely presented the ground on which his objections rested, he would beg leave to trespass one moment on the time of the House.

Mr. M. found no hesitation in saying, that he considered Congress had undoubted power to establish a bank; and he would say, too, in his judgment, that power had been discreetly exercised in the establishment of the old Bank of the United States. He said he had listened with much attention and instruction to the remarks which had fallen from the advocates of both the systems which had been presented in the discussion, and he did not think either of them free of objections; yet, had he been persuaded, that, under present circumstances, it would be proper to establish any bank, he might perhaps have agreed to one of the projects which had been presented. He doubted, however, the propriety of any more banks in the present alarming state of our country—paper money had depreciated, and suspicion was so much afloat, that he could not travel the credit of almost any bank, in three hours ride, on any post road. He doubted the propriety of adding to this flood of bank paper, and feared it would hasten the return of that singular spectacle, when “a debtor will be seen persecuting his creditor with unrelenting punctuality, and paying him without mercy.” He could not but doubt the propriety of increasing the issue of paper money at this time.

But, Mr. M. said, his objections did not stop here; he had understood, throughout the whole debate, that this bank was part of a system of finance; he doubted the propriety of placing reliance on a bank, for bringing any considerable revenue into the Treasury; he thought the proper office of a bank was to facilitate the collection of revenue created in some other way. If, as had been avowed, the object was to create a revenue by means of the bank, he considered it competent for him to look beyond the means, and inquire what was the object to which these means were to be applied? He was free to confess his opinions had undergone a complete revolution on this subject. At the commencement of the session, he had felt no disposition to withhold supplies of men or money; he arrived at this conclusion, in the belief that the conquest of Canada had been abandoned, and that our resources would be directed to the defence of the country. His opinion in favor of granting men and money, had been fortified by the despatches from our Ministers at Ghent. Under these impressions, he had lately visited his constituents, (by permission of the House,) and, in free conversation with his friends, had told them he should vote, not only for the bank, but a full system of finance; and would moreover agree to the most efficient Constitutional measures which might be devised for filling the ranks of the Army. This was his determination when he left his district, and this determination was not altered till he read Mr. Monroe's letter, which came out in favor of conscription! Mr. M. feared that letter might be considered as expressing the sense of this House, as well as that of the Administration. He hoped he might be mistaken; but when he read the law of the Legislature of the State of New York, and understood that a similar law was in progress before the Virginia Legislature; when he saw before him the bill which had passed the Senate, and the one which had been laid on his table from the Military Committee of this House, he could not but consider them all as giving “dreadful note of preparation.”

Mr. M. considered that he had a perfect right to discuss the question of conscription on the passage of this bill; he contended that on any bill which seeks to raise money, it was a legitimate inquiry to ask the object for which the money was wanted, and if it was for an improper object, the money ought not to be granted. But he did not intend, at this time, to enter into a discussion of this question of conscription; he had no doubt some occasion would shortly present, which would bring this question directly before the House; in that case he might, perhaps, trouble them with a few remarks. In the mean time he could not forbear to say that he had not been able to disguise from himself, and he had no wish to conceal from others, that he viewed this subject with horror and alarm. He was opposed to it in all its aspects, and would not give it any aid directly or indirectly.

Mr. M. said he had lately considered this bank as part of a system to raise money for the conquest of Canada, by means of a military conscription. He considered himself, therefore, bound by every motive of duty and of patriotism to oppose it; and he would oppose it. He should not only vote against the reconsideration of the question, but, once for all, he wished it to be understood, that, until the question of conscription was disposed of, he should on the same ground vote against any bills for men or money which could by any possibility be used for that object.

The motion was opposed by Mr. FISK of Vermont, and advocated by Mr. FISK of New York, and Mr. FARROW of North Carolina.

Mr. FORSYTH then withdrew his motion for the present, intimating that he might renew it to-morrow.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to print the Secretary of the Treasury's letter read this morning; when an adjournment was called for and took place just before sundown.

gations, discounted by banks, bankers, and certain companies; and on bills of exchange of certain descriptions;" was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message was received from the Senate announcing the rejection of the joint resolution from this House for appointing a committee to inquire into the expediency of removing the sittings of Congress to some other building.

THE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the success of the enemy, in his invasion into this District in August last, delivered in a report of very great length, together with a voluminous mass of documents. This report (principally of a narrative character) Mr. J. moved to be printed, together with the following documents, selected from the mass laid before the Committee, as tending to give an impartial view of the whole transaction:

1. A report of the Army, its number and distribution, previous to the 1st July, 1814.
2. Letter of Colonel Monroe, then Secretary of State.
3. Letter of General Armstrong, late Secretary of War.
4. Letter from the Hon. William Jones, Secretary of the Navy.
5. Letters from the Hon. Richard Rush, Attorney General.
6. Communication from the War Department, including the orders in relation to the 10th military district, the requisition of the 4th July, and the correspondence with the Governors of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Maryland, and with General Winder.
7. The narrative of General Winder.
8. Reports of Generals Stansbury, Smith, Young, Douglass, and Hungerford; Colonels Sterrett, Minor, Tayloe, Laval, and Beall; Major Pinkney; and Captains Burch and Caldwell.
9. Report from the Navy Department, including the official report of Commodore Barney.
10. Letters from General Van Ness, Doctor Catlett, and John Law.
11. Reports from the Ordnance department.
12. Sentence of the court martial in relation to Captain Dyson, and the correspondence between him and the Secretary of War.
13. Report from the Corporation of Alexandria, including the capitulation, and letter from General John Mason.
14. Report from the Superintendent of Public Buildings.
15. Letter from William Simmons.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, observing the great volume of the report and documents, objected to the printing of these papers, lest the length of time it would occupy should delay a consideration of the report.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, (a member of the Committee of Investigation,) hoped the papers would be printed. He dissented altogether from the manner in which that report had been prepared, though he was willing to do justice to the assiduity of the chairman of the committee in maturing the report. As soon as the documents should be properly in the possession of the House, Mr. W. said he should think it his duty to make some motion on the subject. The report itself had indeed been a product of great labor—it was a sort of chronicle—but, in his view, it answered no one purpose for which the committee who made it had been appointed. So far from clearing up the causes of the failure of our arms at this place, he thought it was calculated (though not intended) to cover up in a mass of prolixity and detail what he considered a most disgraceful transaction.

Mr. GROSVENOR withdrew his opposition to the printing of these papers.

Mr. JOHNSON said, the House would form its judgment of the manner in which the committee had discharged their duty, from the documents collected by it and presented to the House, and from the statements of facts, and the conclusions which they had drawn therefrom. The committee had deemed it their duty—and that duty they performed without favor or affection—to speak freely upon all subjects arising from the transaction, the development of which had been committed to them, except on the solitary question of military conduct. They had collected all the facts that had come to their knowledge in relation to the military movements, and had thought proper to leave for the decision of those equally qualified with themselves to judge what better might have been done. If the committee had erred in any of their opinions, those opinions were subject to the will of the House. In relation to the mere military question, whenever the proper opportunity presented itself, he was not disposed to withhold either censure or praise, when it should appear to him to be due. He would venture to say, whatever difference of opinion might arise on those points on which the committee had not expressed an opinion, on those on which it had expressed an opinion, its views would receive the sanction, not only of the House, but of the whole world. In relation to himself, Mr. J. said, he claimed no other merit than having toiled with the rest of the committee in making up an opinion on the subject, &c.

Mr. WEBSTER said, he should be sorry to be supposed to have found fault with the manner of execution of the principle adopted by the committee. He complained that the committee had not thought proper to express any decided opinion on the transactions submitted to their investigation. Although the fact was announced that the enemy had landed within fifty miles of this place, and that twelve hundred men of their army had overthrown all the force collected here with two months' notice, no opinion was expressed of these circumstances. Neither would it be seen in the report that the burning of the Navy Yard was justifiable, or whether it was not an act of infatuation.

Mr. W. said he objected to the report, because it expressed no opinion, and served in no degree to lead the public sentiment in respect to this disaster, and it was therefore that he proposed to question its correctness, &c. He heartily concurred in the motion for printing the report.

Mr. JOHNSON moved to refer the report to a Committee of the Whole, and make it the order for the third Monday in December. This would leave the report open to discussion, in which, come when it would, he proposed to be in the front rank and not in the rear. On this, as on all other occasions, he should face his duty as became a man.

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, suggested the propriety of the report's lying on the table until printed. When the House should be in full possession of its contents, they would be able to act on it more intelligently, &c. This suggestion, however, was overruled, and the reference and printing of the report, as moved, were both agreed to.

FISCAL AFFAIRS.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, viz: the motion to print the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, yesterday laid before the House by the bank committee.

Mr. EPES, of Virginia, said he thought the best course to pursue in relation to this subject, would be to recommend the letter to the committee who reported it, or to the Committee of Ways and Means. Mr. E. said he understood the fact to be, that the failure on the part of the public to meet any payment of the public debt, had not arisen from any want of funds, but from the difficulty of transporting those funds. He had understood, for instance, that there were sufficient funds in Baltimore to meet the payments which it was necessary to make at Philadelphia. It was important for the public to know that the difficulties adverted to by the Secretary, in his letter, had proceeded from causes which materially affected the ability of individuals to meet their engagements, and not from want of foresight in the financial department, or from a disregard to the inviolability of the public engagements. Another reason induced him to believe that this letter ought to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. At the commencement of the session, that committee had reported their opinion that it was not the interest of the United States further to rely on loans; they had therefore reported to the House a plan to provide for the ways and means of the ensuing year, not bottomed on loans. While their report was before the House, and not acted on, the new Secretary of the Treasury arrived, and took his station at the head of that department. The committee, conceiving it due to him to give him an opportunity to express his views on the subject, had called on him to do so. In this letter to them, he had preferred a different system to that they had recommended for the relief of the immediate exigencies of the Government; and, instead of providing for a national circulating medium, had relied on the aid to be afforded by a National Bank. Mr. E. said he had no wish whatever to cast censure on the Secretary of the Treasury, but to screen himself, and the committee to which he belonged, from censure for any alleged deficiency in the provision for the supplies for the present quarter. Every supply asked for by the Treasury had been granted by Congress—being merely a partial loan to supply the deficiency created by sending a part of the twenty-five million loan to Europe for sale. The idea of the Secretary was, that, with the aid of a National Bank, he could negotiate the balance of the loan within the present quarter, so as to meet the demands against the Treasury within that period. No blame, therefore, rested on the Committee of Ways and Means in this respect; they had acquitted themselves of their duty. There was another reason why he thought the letter ought to be committed as he proposed. If there was no adequate provision for the demands of the present quarter provision ought to be immediately made to enable our citizens having unsatisfied claims on the Government to fund the balances due to them, or receive interest on the amount of them. For another reason, he thought the letter ought to be referred. The circumstances stated by the Secretary of the Treasury required that some circulating medium should be forthwith established to prevent embarrassment to the Government from the recurrence of like difficulties.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, said he was opposed to the proposed reference of this letter to the Committee of Ways and Means, because there was no information contained in it, he presumed, which was not already in possession of the House; and because no scheme of finance was suggested in it which had not been already before that committee. It appeared to him the gentleman from Virginia had misapprehended a part of the letter altogether, when he considered it as personally concerning himself. Mr. F. said he could not see anything in the letter which threw a censure on the Committee of Ways and Means, or on any part of this House. He saw no general reason for the reference, and he could not see the force of the particular reason which the gentleman had assigned.

The question was then taken on reference, and carried; and also on printing, and likewise carried. [For the letter, see ante page 651.]

NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. KILBOURN, of Ohio, said he had ever considered it to be the interest of the United States that a National Bank should be established, for the convenient management of its finances. It was with satisfaction he found that to be the opinion of a great majority of the House, by the vote some time ago, on the proposition that it was expedient to establish a National Bank. The project before the House having been rejected, he held in his hand a resolution embracing a sketch of a plan which, if approved, might be put into the shape of a bill. Mr. K. then offered his resolution for consideration.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to prepare, in due form, and report to this House, a bill to establish a National Bank, of which the following shall be the principal, or prominent features, viz: It shall be called the National Bank of the United States. It shall be seated in the city of Philadelphia, but may have branches throughout the Union. The capital stock thereof shall be fifty millions of dollars, divided into five hundred thousand shares, of one hundred dollars each. Thirty millions of the capital may be subscribed by individuals, companies, and corporations; and twenty millions thereof shall be subscribed by the Secretary of the Treasury on behalf of the United States. The thirty millions, subscribed by individuals, companies, and corporations, shall be paid at proper periods, as follows, viz: six millions in specie, eighteen millions in stock created since the year 1811, and six millions in Treasury notes issued since the commencement of the war; that is to say, on each share twenty dollars in specie, sixty dollars in stock, and twenty dollars in Treasury notes. The twenty millions subscribed for the United States, shall be paid in Treasury notes hereafter to be issued, or in stock of the United States, to be hereafter created. For the management of the bank, there shall be fifteen directors, nine of whom shall be elected by the individual stockholders; and six shall be nominated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and appointed by the President of the United States. The board of directors shall appoint the president, and all other officers and servants of the principal bank and of the branches. The charter to continue twenty years, and no other bank charters to be granted by Congress during that time, except to the banking associations now formed within the District of Columbia. Subscriptions to be opened in one or more places in every State and Territory, and in the District of Columbia, under the care of proper superintendents. The bank shall go into operation, so soon as one million two hundred thousand dollars, [as intended twelve millions of dollars,] in due proportion of specie, stock, and Treasury notes, is paid in upon the subscriptions. The bank shall be authorized to receive, upon all loans it shall make, an interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum, and no more. When the subscriptions shall be filled to the amount of fifty millions, and the same be paid in, the bank may be required to loan to the Government twenty-five millions of dollars, and at any time prior to the completing of that amount of subscription, it may be required to loan to Government, in that proportion, to the amount actually subscribed and paid in. It shall be the right and duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to inspect all the books of the bank, and Congress may appoint committees for that purpose. And the President of the United States shall be empowered, in certain cases, and during certain limited periods, to authorize or direct the suspension of specie payments at the bank, or to substitute therefor certain Treasury notes; which suspension, or substitution, with the causes thereof, he shall make public by proclamation; and the same, in like manner, to recall and revoke, when the cause or causes shall cease to operate; or, in case of their continuance, to lay the same before Congress at the next session thereafter, that they may take such measures thereon as shall appear to them expedient.

[Had the foregoing been received and adopted by the House, Mr. K. intended to have added the following proposition, viz: Congress shall have power, when they shall deem it expedient, to extend the capital of the bank to $60,000,000, by authorizing a further subscription, on the part of the United States, of $10,000,-

000, payable in six per cent. stock of the United States; and, in such case, there shall be appointed, as above, on behalf of the Government, three additional directors in the board.]

This motion the SPEAKER pronounced to be out of order, as, in substance and matter, the same as that already rejected by the House, and which, therefore, could not now be resumed, unless by a vote of reconsideration to-day.

Mr. KILBOURN remarked, that he had not understood that his motion would be considered by the Chair out of order, or he would not have proposed it. He the more readily withdrew it, because he understood that it was yet intended to move a reconsideration of the vote of yesterday.

On motion, of Mr. EPPES, the House then proceeded to the orders of the day.

TAX ON DISTILLED LIQUORS, &c.

The bill to provide an additional revenue for defraying the expenses of the Government, and for the payment of the public debt, by laying an additional duty on spirits distilled, and for amending the act, already in existence, for taxing that article, was read a third time. [The additional tax is fixed at twenty cents per gallon on the quantity distilled.]

Mr. CANNON, of Tennessee, moved to recommend the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.

On this motion Mr. C. spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I have two objections to the bill in its present shape, which I think probably the House will remedy, in the event this motion succeed. In the first place, I object to the amount of the additional duty on the article on which we are about to increase the tax; and in the second place, I also object to the mode in which this tax is about to be laid. The double mode of laying the tax now about to be adopted, is somewhat intricate and vexatious, and I think would be calculated to produce much difficulty to the persons who collect the revenue, as well as all those who may be engaged in making spirits. Sir, said he, by continuing the tax on the capacity of the stills, you subject all those persons engaged in this business, to all the trouble, difficulty, and inconvenience of going to the collectors from the different parts of the collection districts, and carrying with them their securities, and giving bonds to the collector for the tax on the capacity, that you otherwise would do, were the whole of the tax laid in that way; and now, in addition to all this, you are about to subject the owner of every distillery, who may think proper to use it under this law, to the additional trouble and inconvenience of keeping an exact account of every drop of spirits made in his distillery, and render the same to the collector of the revenue four times in each and every year; to be sworn to, either by himself or by the person or persons who may be employed in attending his distillery; this I think, sir, will produce much embarrassment and difficulty. It must be known to every member in this House, that in many parts of the United States—I know it is the case in the Western country—the owners of distilleries frequently have other persons employed to attend them; and sometimes in the course of two or three months they have two or three different persons in their employ, whom they would find it difficult and almost impossible to collect together, and have present at the time of rendering to the collector their different accounts of the amount of spirits distilled (during the time pointed out in this bill,) in which they are required to make said returns. Again, Mr. Speaker, a similar additional trouble and difficulty must be imposed on the collector. If this bill passes with its present provisions, he will certainly have to keep some kind of a separate book, containing the amount of spirits made by each person engaged in distilling spirits in his district, within the certain stated period, pointed out by this bill; he must certainly first know the precise amount of spirits made by each individual, before he can possibly know the amount of additional revenue to demand and collect from each distiller in his district. Thus, sir, I think I have clearly shown that a two-fold difficulty, trouble, and expense, will be imposed by this mode of laying the tax, both on the collectors of the revenue as well as those engaged in distilling spirits; and that, too, without the smallest possible benefit either to individuals or the Government. And although I would have preferred an increase of the tax on the capacity of the stills, to a certain extent, because I think it the most certain revenue; at the same time I think it better to lay the whole tax on the gallon, than to adopt the measure now before us. Either mode of laying the tax I think far preferable to this double mode of taxation. Either of the modes I have suggested for increasing the tax, I think far better than the one contemplated by the House; with only half the trouble and difficulty to encounter, it would produce precisely the same current of revenue.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia, who is chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, has told us that the tax laid on the capacity of the stills, by the former act of Congress, produces a certain revenue which he could not consent to give up, because the other mode proposed, to lay the tax on the gallon, was more uncertain. This certainly would be a strong argument in favor of increasing the tax on the capacity of the stills, because, if you increase the tax in that way to a certain amount, you will still continue to have a certain revenue to anticipate. But, sir, as it is contemplated to be laid by this bill, you cannot know what your revenue will be, derived from that article, until you can ascertain the amount of spirits made and returned to the collectors under the provisions of the law. And in addition to all this, be assured, if the tax is increased to this amount and in the manner contemplated by the bill now under consideration, it will have a tendency, in a great degree, to depress the business of making domestic spirits throughout the United States. The price of this article consequently must be vastly increased; and all this increased price on the large quantities that must be purchased by the Government for the use of the Army, will amount to the same, as respects the Government, as a reduction of the revenue derived from this article. Certainly it cannot be the intention of this House to lay such enormous duties on the distilling of spirits, as to prevent those persons owning distilleries from using them, nor can it at this time be the interest of the Government to impose such taxes on them as will in a very great degree diminish the quantity made, as, by doing this, the very object of the law will be defeated; instead of obtaining a larger amount of revenue, than that derived heretofore, I fear we would obtain less. Sir, I cannot see, for my own part, the policy of laying such heavy taxes on our infant manufactures, so useful in our country, and so indispensable to increase the wealth and prosperity of this nation. I would think it much better to bear as lightly on them as possible, and endeavor to give them every encouragement in our power.

But, Mr. Speaker, to return more immediately to the subject before you, I contend that the tax contemplated to be laid by this bill, is unjust and unequal. A distillery, the whole establishment of which would not cost more, perhaps, than five hundred or one thousand dollars, under this law the owner for using the same one year would probably have to pay a tax of seven hundred or one thousand dollars, being as much, or perhaps more than the property thus used would be worth. If you pass the bill in its present shape, what would be the situation of the poor man, owning a small distillery of this description, with but little property of any other description, when compared with that of a wealthy citizen owning vast property of a different description? Why, sir, the poor man thus owning a distillery, whose whole property including the same not amounting to more than seven or eight hundred dollars, would have to pay to the Government for using his distillery one year, an amount equal to the value of his whole property, while his wealthy neighbor would be secured in the enjoyment of property of perhaps ten times his amount, without paying half as much to the support of the Government. A law of this kind, I think, will certainly have an unjust as well as an unequal operation. I am willing to go as far as any member in this House in the adoption of such measures as will support the Government and revive the public credit, but at the same time I think we ought to endeavor to lay our taxes and increase our revenue in such way as will, as near as possible, have an equal bearing on all the people of the United States, and to call on each individual more in proportion to his wealth, and consequently his ability to pay. I am confident, if this bill passes without alteration, it will defeat the object we have in view—it will put down many of the distilleries in every part of the country, and, instead of increasing, may, perhaps, lessen the revenue. Sir, it is very far from being my object to throw obstacles in the way of any measures calculated to get the Government out of its present difficulties, nor would I have made this motion to recommit the bill for the purpose of changing it, and reducing the tax, had I believed it was the intention of the House to raise the taxes on any other property, or articles of any description, equal to the tax contemplated by this bill. But, believing no article or other property will be taxed equal to it, I cannot vote for this bill as it now stands. I believe it to be inconsistent with those grand principles of justice and equality that should at all times distinguish the conduct of this Legislative body. Were I to give this measure my support, I should believe I was supporting a measure, the operation of which would be unjust and unequal in its operation, not only as it respects the different States in the Union, but also between individuals who are citizens of the same State. The honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. McKim) as well as the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Farrow,) are both opposed to the recommitment of this bill, because they think the House has previously settled the question, as to the amount of the tax. But, sir, it must be recollected, when in Committee of the Whole, we did determine to reduce the additional tax to fifteen cents per gallon, which was afterwards disagreed to in the House; therefore I cannot but hope the motion I have submitted to the House for recommitting the bill for the objects I have stated will prevail.

Mr. Fisk, of Vermont, opposed the motion. This tax, he contended, would, in the result, exhibit as great a product from the Eastern as Western States, &c.

The motion for recommitment was supported by Mr. HUMPHREYS, of Tennessee, in an argument of some length, the object of which was to demonstrate the unequal operation of this tax as affecting relatively the Eastern or Western States.

Mr. GROSVENOR said, he hoped the bill would not be recommitment. If there were no better reasons to be offered for such a motion, than those which have transpired from the gentleman just sat down, the recommitment would, in his opinion, be worse than useless. The gentleman, Mr. G. said, moaned most piteously about the unequal pressure of the bill; it pressed the Western States to the earth, while the East and the North escape the pressure. How is this made out? Why, says the gentleman, the State of Connecticut has much more property than that of Tennessee; yet the land tax of the first is about one hundred and eighteen thousand dollars, while that of the latter is one hundred and ten thousand. Why, said Mr. G., has the gentleman forgotten that blessed principle in our Constitution which gives a representation of his slaves? And does he not know that the consequence was, that representation and direct taxation should jump together. Tennessee, with nearly fifty thousand less of free population, yet has a number of representatives equal to Connecticut. Hence it is, that the direct tax in the two States must be equal. The gentleman must thank the Southern patriots for this, and, if he dislikes it, join to amend the Constitution. But look at the indirect taxes; by the report of the Secretary, Connecticut has paid, of internal duties, more than fifty-eight thousand dollars, while in the same period, Tennessee has paid only eighteen thousand dollars. Thus, sir, it is apparent, the complaints of the West are wholly unfounded. The indirect taxes press harder upon the Northern and Eastern States, than upon the West. The gentleman has asked, if he should vote for this bill, what he should say to his constituents, when he should return home? I will relieve the gentleman from his difficulty; he may tell them, that three years ago this nation was basking in peace. All the revenues for the support of the Government were derived from commerce, and the country prospered while you were free from burdens. You became loud for war; you forced all your representatives on this floor to vote for war. Commerce was of course destroyed, and all our revenue vanished. To support this war, which was in part compelled by you, this bill is now indispensable; you must be content with deep taxation; you must "pay for the whistle which you have purchased." This may be the conclusive answer, said Mr. G., to any reproach which the gentleman may receive from his constituents.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, opposed the recommitment. In the dispute between the Eastern and Western States, the intermediate ground was entirely overlooked; though he contended Pennsylvania would pay as large a proportion of the tax as any other State; and therefore he should vote for it, because he was desirous that State should, in the present crisis, contribute its full proportion. Among other things, speaking in support of the tax, Mr. I. said, he could not see why, whenever this whiskey tax came up, so many wry faces should be made upon it; and the amount of the tax could not be considered very oppressive, when, even after the tax was laid, a man might make himself dead drunk for sixpence.

Mr. HUMPHREYS, in reply to Mr. GROSVENOR, who remarked, that even if the tax did operate oppressively, the people of the West ought to bear it patiently, because made necessary by the war for which they had been so anxious—remarked, with much point, on the weakness of this argument. The people of Tennessee, he said, had advocated the war from their zeal in behalf of the rights and honor of the country, which they believed to demand it; and it would be hard indeed, if they were to be taxed higher than other sections of the Union, because more devoted to their country's rights.

Mr. KILBOURN, of Ohio, also advocated the recommitment of the bill, for the general reasons assigned by other gentlemen. The tax already in existence, he said, had suppressed or stopped perhaps one-half of the distilleries in his district, and the increase now proposed of four hundred per cent. on the present duty would, he conceived, rather reduce than increase the revenue, as he endeavored to demonstrate by a number of arguments.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, asked for information of the gentleman from Ohio, what proportion of the direct tax within that State was paid by non-residents?

H. OF R.

Tax on Distilled Liquors, &c.

NOVEMBER, 1814.

Mr. KILBOURN admitted, that more than one-half of the last direct tax in Ohio, had, in effect been paid by non-residents, though but a small part more; but that four-fifths of the soil was owned by non-residents; which disproportion in the amount of tax paid by the residents to the lands owned by them, he might have mentioned when up before, had he been so disposed, as one of the hardships under which the State labored.

Mr. McKIM spoke against the recommitment of the bill, and in reply to the arguments of inequality and oppressiveness in its operation, both which he denied. The consumer paying the tax, independent of the general view of the taxes, he believed the Atlantic States would pay as large a portion of this particular tax as the Western.

Mr. FARROW, of South Carolina, opposed recommitment, on the ground that the question had already been amply discussed, and seriously settled as to the amount of the tax; though, he intimated, he should be opposed to the passage of the bill unless a provision should be introduced into it allowing a drawback on exportation, in order to avoid a violation of the Constitutional provision against a tax on exports.

Mr. CANNON again spoke in support of his motion. He said he could not vote for the bill as it now stood; if he did, he should believe he was voting for a measure whose operation would be unjust and unequal—not only as to the different States of the Union, but as to the citizens of the same State. As the House had already once changed its vote on this subject, he hoped it might in this instance yield to his wishes for a recommitment.

The question on a recommitment of the bill was then decided in the negative—for recommitment 44, against it 111, as follows:

So the bill was passed and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the two other tax bills. The bill first taken up was that for imposing additional taxes on pleasure carriages and the harness thereof.

The bill having been read through, Mr. EPPES stated in a very lucid manner, the grounds on which the committee had framed the provisions of this bill in the shape in which it was presented to the House.

This bill having been discussed and gone through, the other bill, for imposing a variety of miscellaneous taxes, was also taken up and gone through, and both bills were reported to the House.

WEDNESDAY, November 30.

Another member, to wit: from New York, NATHANIEL HOWELL, appeared, and took his seat.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the two tax bills, and the amendments made thereto were taken up and considered. And the bills having been further discussed and amended, were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

nold, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was concurred in by the House, and the Committee of Pensions and Revolutionary Claims directed to bring in a bill accordingly.

The bill extending the right of pre-emption to settlers in the Illinois Territory, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and underwent considerable discussion. When the bill was reported to the House, it was ordered to lie on the table.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate authorizing a draught of 80,000 militia for the defence of the frontier, and on the bill for filling the Regular Army by a classification of the free male population. The bills were no more than read through, when (the House being thin) the Committee rose, reported progress, and adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 1.

On motion of Mr. PLEASANTS, the Committee on the Judiciary Establishment were instructed to inquire into the propriety of authorizing the judges of the circuit Courts of the United States to call special courts, for the trials of appeals from the decisions of the district courts in admiralty, and especially in prize cases.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. ROBERTSON, and was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That so much of the rules of this House which is supposed to prevent the re-examination of a subject which has been decided on, be suspended, so far as relates to the establishment of a National Bank.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting his report, made in obedience to a resolution of the House of the 3d March, 1813, upon the state and condition of the several navy yards belonging to the United States; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit, for the information of Congress, the communications last received from the Ministers Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States at Ghent, explaining the course and actual state of their negotiations with the Plenipotentiaries of Great Britain.

The said Message and communications were read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and 5,000 copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the members of this House.

PETITION OF JOHN APPLETON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, on the petition of John Appleton; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 28, 1814.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a report, prepared in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 28th day of October last.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,
A. J. DALLAS.
Hon. L. CHEVES, Speaker, H. of R.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 28, 1814.

In obedience to the order of the House of Representatives, dated the 28th October, 1814, referring the petition of John Appleton to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary respectfully reports:

That the act of Congress for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties fixes the compensation of the principal assessor by the number of days employed in hearing appeals and making out lists, allowing, in that respect, two dollars each day; and by the number of taxable persons contained in the tax lists as delivered by the principal assessors to the collectors, allowing, in that respect, four dollars for every hundred taxable persons. But, the act requires the principal assessors to perform various other important services, in the division of assessment districts, in the appointment and direction of assistant assessors, in the preparation or holding appeals, and, generally, in carrying the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury into effect, without providing any compensation for those services independent of the general provision, which has been stated, and which, it is seen, graduates the compensation, by reference only to services performed in the latter stages of official duty.

That, on the 27th November, 1813, the petitioner, John Appleton, was duly appointed by the President of the United States, in the recess of the Senate, to be principal assessor for the tenth Massachusetts district; and that the petitioner (as it is understood and believed at this Department) entered upon his official duties, and performed all the services required by the act of Congress, until the Senate rejected his nomination, at their next session, and until the rejection was made known to him, as well as the appointment of Samuel Hoar to be his successor, by a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, dated the 26th March, 1814. That, at this period, however, the valuation and assessment of the direct tax had not been matured; no appeals had been heard, and no lists of taxable persons had been delivered to the collector; but the petitioner promptly and fairly delivered his official books and papers to his successor, reserving his right of compensation for the subsequent consideration of the proper department.

That the petitioner is entitled to some compensation for services rendered during a period of four months cannot be denied, consistently with the principles of justice; but it seems to have been the opinion of the late Secretary of the Treasury that the compensation prescribed by law could not be exceeded; that the whole was payable to the principal assessor in office, at the time of holding the appeals and delivering the tax lists to the collector; and that any apportionment of the compensation was a matter of private arrangement and agreement between the new and the old officer. The latter, however, has claimed the whole amount, upon the terms of the act of Congress; and his account has been stated and settled, accordingly, by the Auditor and Comptroller; but the warrant for payment has not yet been issued.

That, under these circumstances, the order of the House of Representatives has made it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to review the subject; and, with every proper deference for the judgment of his predecessor, he has been led to a result differing, in some measure, from the opinion expressed by that respectable gentleman.

He considers the designation of a principal assessor as the designation of an officer, and not of a person; and that the whole compensation is given for the performance of the whole of the duty of the office. Whether a change of the officer is produced by death, resignation, or removal, the office itself and the duties of the office equally remain entire and unchanged.

He considers the opposite construction of the words of the act as hostile to its spirit, leading to a contingent charge upon the public, which the Legislature did not contemplate, or to the oppression of an individual, which justice will not permit.

He considers the apportionment of the compensation, in this case, between the first and the second principal assessors, to be regularly within the province of the accounting officers of the Treasury; and that the materials for making it (if the parties should not prefer an amicable adjustment) may readily be obtained.

All which is respectfully submitted.

FRIDAY, December 2.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to extend the time of Oliver Evans's patent for his improvement on steam engines;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The House resumed the consideration of Mr. ROBERTSON'S motion, to suspend so much of the rule of the House as precludes the reconsideration of any subject on which the House has during the same session decided.

Some debate arose on the motion, which was supported by the mover and by Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania, and opposed by Mr. STANFORD, and others. In the course of the debate, it was mentioned that a bill on the subject of a National Bank was in preparation in the Senate. Mr.

WARD, of New Jersey, moved to lay the resolution on the table; which motion was negatived, 64 to 44.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the resolution, and negatived, as follows: For the motion 50, against it 65.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to one from the Speaker requiring a warrant for money to defray the charges of this House, apprising him that, the appropriation on this head being exhausted, a further provision therefor by law was necessary. The letter was ordered to lie on the table, on the intimation of Mr. INGHAM that the Committee of Ways and Means were about to act on the subject.

A report was received from the War Department on the petition of the President and Directors of the Eastern Branch Bridge. The report states that the bridge was destroyed at the instance of General Winder, but by the agency of the Navy Department, and under the immediate superintendence of Captain Creighton.

This report was, on motion of Mr. LEWIS of Virginia, referred to the Committee of Claims.

WAR MEASURES.

The House then, on motion of Mr. TROUP, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the several bills reported by the Military Committee of this House, as well as the two bills from the Senate on that subject. The bill first taken up, was the bill authorizing the President of the United States to call into service eighty thousand and four hundred and thirty militia, to serve two years, for the defence of the frontiers of the United States.

Mr. TROUP said, that the bill before them being a bill from the Senate, which had not been referred to the Military Committee, but which had been taken up on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) the Military Committee, as such, were strangers to its provisions. It was not to be expected, therefore, that he could give to the House an exposition of its principles and details. The gentleman from South Carolina was no doubt prepared to do so. For himself, Mr. T. said he was opposed to the measure of the Senate, and would therefore move to strike out the first section of the bill; it would try the principle. The measure of the Senate, he humbly conceived, was inadequate to the object. It proposed to give you a militia force, when you wanted not a militia but a regular force. He respectfully suggested to the House, in considering this subject, the propriety of endeavoring, in the first place, to establish the principle on which they would rest their military measures for the further prosecution of the war; whether it were the principle of classification and draught, or classification and penalty; whether the principle proposed by the Senate, or any other principle, they could not, he humbly conceived, arrive at any conclusion satisfactory to the House, or useful and honorable to the country, without adopting this mode of proceeding. Having established the principle, the Committee of the Whole, or a select committee, might consider the details.

Mr. T. said he very well knew that mankind were governed by their hopes and fears; more by their hopes than their fears; and he was not insensible of the effect which the despatches received yesterday from our Ministers at Ghent might have on the measures under consideration. He should be very sorry if the effect would be to induce the Legislature to discontinue or relax the preparations necessary for a vigorous prosecution of the war. If such should be the effect, the enemy might have good reason to exult in the success of a diplomatic trick played off at Ghent, which, lulling us into a false security, would enable him to strike us at the opening of the next campaign, unarmed and unprepared. If he should be able to do so, he would begin to consider himself a match for the Yankees in cunning, and we would repent when it was too late. Mr. T. said he did not mean to say we would not have peace—politics were too uncertain to justify such a declaration—we may have peace in a few weeks. He only meant to say, that calculations founded on events which may happen at Ghent or at Vienna, and which would induce the Legislature to relax in the necessary preparations for the next campaign, ought not to be indulged; measures ought to be taken, not on a supposition of speedy peace, but of protracted war. If peace happened, the preparation for war would do no harm. If peace did not happen, the want of preparation would do much harm; it might lose the next campaign, and losing the next campaign might lose the objects of the war. I only suggest therefore, sir, that it is wise and prudent to act as if the negotiations at Ghent would certainly fail. In submitting, sir, to the Committee, the few observations with which I intend to trouble them on this motion, I will endeavor to satisfy them that the measure proposed by the Senate ought not to be taken, because it places our reliance for a successful prosecution of the war on irregular militia; whereas our reliance ought to be placed on disciplined troops, and that some other measure, therefore, ought to be resorted to—some measure calculated to fill the regular ranks and augment the regular establishment.

In making provision for the further prosecution of the war there would be but one object common to all—to bring the war to a speedy and honorable termination by all the means in the power of the Legislature. At least it would be an object common to every genuine American, because every American had an interest in it. The war was a war for the country, and the result of it, whatever it might be, whether glorious or inglorious, would determine the character of the country and Government. If glorious, every American, without distinction of party, would participate in that glory; if inglorious, every American, without distinction of party, would participate in the infamy of it. He knew very well that certain gentlemen had said the war was a party war, a war for the Administration—but gentlemen would find ere long their mistake.

They would find that Europe, the civilized world, who will alone be competent to pass judgment upon this subject, will not stop to inquire by what party in America this war was declared—by what party it was prosecuted—by what party brought to its termination. No, sir, they will look to the result, and to the result only, and as that result is glorious or inglorious for the country, so will they determine the character of this country and Government. Every American, therefore, is interested to bring the war to an honorable termination by all the means in his power. But how is this to be done? I answer, in the spirit and language of perfect simplicity, by endeavoring to create a motive in the enemy to discontinue the contest. But how is this to be effected? I answer, in the same spirit and language, by endeavoring to wound him where he is vulnerable. The enemy is vulnerable in two points; in his commerce on the ocean—in his territorial possessions neighboring to us. If by any possibility (which I do not admit) he should succeed so effectually to blockade our ports and harbors as to shut up completely our public and private armed vessels, he will cease to be vulnerable in his commerce; he will remain vulnerable in his territorial possessions only. There, sir, I would carry the war without hesitation; there I would endeavor to create a motive in him to discontinue the contest. In proportion as he values his territory, in the same proportion will he make sacrifices to preserve it; as you endanger the existence of his territory, in the same degree will be his motive to discontinue the war to preserve it. That he sets a high value on his territories you have the strongest evidence. He has already made great exertions to preserve them; he has been able to preserve them only because you have not made great efforts to conquer them. You never will conquer them by taking the measure of the Senate. Will any man believe we can induce the enemy to discontinue the war by manning the lines of our frontiers—standing on the defensive—receiving and repelling his blows as well as we can? No, sir, so far from inducing the enemy to abandon the contest, this mode of prosecuting the war would only increase his motive to continue it, whilst the motive on our part to discontinue it would be daily and hourly increasing. A dishonorable peace would terminate the contest—the surrender of our independence would terminate it—nothing else could. I would, therefore, carry the war into the enemy's country, and with a force enabling you to wound him there. But the military force of the enemy has been greatly augmented. It is unnecessary to speak of the events by which this augmentation has been brought about—it is sufficient that we know and feel it. Ordinary prudence requires that your own military force be augmented; not merely in the same proportion—in a much greater proportion. In a much greater proportion, because, all other things being equal, he has one decided advantage over you—an advantage which we can neither destroy nor remove—I mean the command of the ocean, by which he compels you to stand upon the defensive on a line of frontier of 2,000 miles, and to defend that line with 100,000 men against 10,000 afloat. He comes, no man can tell when, no man can tell where; and, to be prepared at all, he compels you to be prepared at all points. I say, therefore, your augmentation ought to be in much greater proportion than his augmentation. But what description of our military force will you augment? Sir, if, after what has happened, I could for a moment believe there could be any doubt or hesitation upon this point, I would consider everything as lost; then, indeed, would there be an end of hope and of confidence—then, indeed, would there be nothing before us but gloom and despondency, and the horror of despair. But you will not doubt—you will place your reliance on a disciplined regular force; upon a regular disciplined force alone can you rely for success. It matters not whether you determine to conduct the war offensively or defensively; if you determine to prosecute it offensively, you ought to rely mainly on a regular force—because, to be successful, you must meet and beat in the open field the regular veteran troops of Europe. Not one step can you advance in the conquest of Canada until you are prepared to do this. This can only be done by regular disciplined troops. If you determine to prosecute the war defensively, you ought to rely mainly on regular troops; for you must expect to meet and to repel regular disciplined troops—and this can be done most effectually with regular disciplined troops. It will be done not only more effectually, but more economically; not only more economically, but more conveniently for the country. It will save the militia of the country, and in saving the militia it will save the active industry of the country—it will save of course the product of that industry; the product of that industry is national wealth—it will save the national wealth.

But not only do these considerations urge you, in my humble opinion, to resort to all the means within your power to fill the ranks and augment the regular establishment; other considerations call upon you to make the army as respectable in number as it is already in character—considerations growing out of that character. An army, little better than two years old, collected hastily from the plough, the loom, and the work shops—without discipline, without even the rudiments of the military science—the officer to be instructed, that he might be qualified to instruct the soldier—this army has performed deeds of heroism and of gallant daring that would have done honor to the best days of Greece and Rome, that will adorn the page of your own history. It is true, that this army has not from the beginning everywhere triumphed; it is true, it has not from the beginning carried everything before it: it had not strength, it had not numbers. But this much may be said of it, and with truth, that, from the beginning to this moment, it has in no one instance dishonored the standard which it bore; unless, indeed, a solitary instance may be appealed to as an exception—an instance as yet of doubtful and undecided character. More recently its triumphs have been more brilliant; in open field, man to man, it has vanquished the conquerors of the conquerors of Europe. Who can hesitate, therefore, (the war continuing,) to make this army as respectable in number as it is already in character, to enable it to continue these triumphs? The bill from the Senate, instead of proposing this, proposes to authorize the President to call upon the States for eighty thousand raw militia; and this is to be our reliance for the successful prosecution of the war. Take my word for it, sir, that if you do rely upon it (the military power of the enemy continuing undivided) defeat, disaster, and disgrace, must follow. As an auxiliary or secondary force the militia may be relied on; as principal, in a contest with regular troops, never. But the state of the army: Upon this part of the subject, sir, I will say nothing, because I can say nothing that you are not already in possession of. You have authorized a force of sixty odd thousand men; you have raised thirty odd thousand; you have a deficiency of twenty odd thousand to supply: these thirty odd thousand men, already raised, are distributed over a line of four thousand miles of frontier; is it any wonder then, Mr. Speaker, that Canada has not been conquered? No, sir, the wonder is not that Canada has not been conquered, the wonder is that this little army has been able to keep its ground; the enemy has been stronger in regular troops at all points from the beginning, and the very annunciation of this fact is enough to cover our little army with glory. You have a deficiency of twenty odd thousand to supply; how will you supply it? Assuredly the bill from the Senate will not supply it; will the mode heretofore resorted to supply it? Will the recruiting system supply it? No, sir, the recruiting system has failed, I mean it has failed to fill your ranks; what are the facts upon this subject? They are, that two millions of dollars have been applied since January last, and thirteen thousand men have been enlisted; this it may be said is doing very well. So it is; but what is the general result? The general result is, that our army is very little stronger now than it was this time last year; and in testing the operation of the system it is to the general result we must look. At the rate of thirteen thousand men per annum, it would take five years to raise the authorized force; the recruiting system therefore has failed, it has failed to fill our ranks. I do not mean to say, sir, that the recruiting system with the present high bounty and encouragement would not eventually fill our ranks; I am not disposed to say that it would not (provided the power of the enemy had continued broken and divided by the troubles of the Continent) have answered our purpose; but I do say, that under existing circumstances and for our present purpose, the recruiting system ought not to be relied on; it cannot be relied on to fill our ranks by the opening of the next campaign, and to risk the loss of the next campaign is to risk the loss of everything. But is there no mode to which you can resort for filling the ranks but voluntary enlistment? I would be extremely sorry if we could not. I have always thought this Government, when administered in the true spirit of the Constitution, the strongest Government in the world, even for the purposes of war; but if the doctrine set up of late be true, this is the weakest and most contemptible Government on earth, it is neither fit for war nor peace, it has failed of all the ends for which Governments are established. It cannot be true that this Government, charged with the general defence, authorized to declare war and to raise armies, can have but one mode of raising armies, whilst every other Government that has ever existed has had an absolute power over the population of the country for this purpose, and has actually exercised it. But this question is not properly before the House, and I will not go into an argument to show that you can, like other Governments, resort to other modes of raising armies than that of voluntary enlistment; that you can resort to classification and draught, to classification and penalty, or any other mode which a sound discretion may in a particular state of the country dictate and justify. All I intend to say at present is, that you have an absolute power over the population of this country for this purpose, and that in the present state of the country it is wiser to resort to classification and draught, than to resort to the bill from the Senate; the one will give the men certainly and expeditiously, the other will not. But, sir, compare the measures of the Senate with the measures proposed by your own committee, and which are before you. The measure of the Senate proposes to authorize the President to call out eighty thousand militia for two years, and this is called a remedy for the evil of State. Now, sir, the evil of State, as I understand it, is not the want of a militia force, but the want of a regular force. The evil of which the country complains, of which the Government complains, of which the militia themselves complain most grievously, is the number of militia in service; the incessant harassment, vexation, and oppression of the militia, and the extraordinary and burdensome expense of that particular service. As a remedy for this grievance, the Senate propose to detach eighty thousand militia. The President has at command, and has always had at command, a million of militia; and in this extraordinary crisis of our affairs, when pressed by a formidable enemy, and surrounded with difficulties, the remedy proposed by the Senate is eighty thousand militia, which it must be admitted on all hands can be no better, for at least the next campaign, than raw militia called out in the ordinary way. But the bill proposes to furnish regular troops. How? by holding up in terrorem a militia classification and draught. Exempting every three classes which shall furnish two regular soldiers, from the liability to furnish three militiamen. Do the friends of this measure believe—will they with any degree of confidence assert, that it will have the effect, even partially, to fill the ranks? I think not. And suppose it should fail to furnish regular soldiers, what will be our condition in the months of July and August next? Much worse, sir, than our condition in the months of July and August last. The war continuing, the power of the enemy unbroken, our condition will be desperate. The regular force every day falling off, (for be it remembered these eighty thousand militia will be withdrawn from the operations of the recruiting service,) we shall have to oppose to the enemy a remnant of regular troops, and these eighty thousand raw militia—and who will answer for the consequences? In the months of August and September last, we had in the field the regular Army and upwards of one hundred thousand militia, and we nowhere found ourselves too strong. It is true the Senate propose to improve the recruiting system—an improvement which two years ago this House proposed to the Senate, but which the Senate then thought proper to reject. I mean the enlistment of young men between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one. But if these eighty thousand militia for two years should happen to be, as they are likely to be, that very description of population upon which this system would otherwise operate, what hope can be entertained that the recruiting system even with its improvements will be as productive the next year as the last. I humbly conceive, Mr. Speaker, that the measure of the Senate, proceeding from the best intentions, will fail in the accomplishment of our object. I conceive, with much deference to the House, that the measures reported by their own committee are much to be preferred. They propose—first, to augment the regular establishment to one hundred thousand men; second, to authorize the President to accept under liberal encouragements the service of volunteer corps; third, to authorize the President to receive into the service of the United States State troops, which may be raised to serve in lieu of the militia of such States. The principle of the system is, to substitute, as far as we are able, a regular force for a militia force, as more efficient, more economical, and, for the militia themselves, more convenient—and one hundred thousand regulars would take the place of two hundred thousand militia—two hundred thousand militia would cost as much as three hundred thousand regulars. If we can command an hundred thousand regular troops, it may, notwithstanding, be necessary, on particular emergencies, to resort to the militia. To enable the Government still further to spare the militia, volunteers are authorized. They also will be more efficient than ordinary militia. It is impossible to say to what extent these corps will offer themselves—to whatever extent the Government is enabled to avail itself of their services, to the same extent will the militia be saved. If Government should derive no aid from this source, it has another resource in State troops. They also will take the place of the militia. The militia will still continue the bulwark of the country. Whenever the existence of the country shall be endangered, it is the militia that must save it. The system proposes to relieve them from the constant harassment of which they complain, and justly complain. To raise the regular troops, you have the alternative proposed by the Secretary of War, or the committee. The plan of the Secretary of War is the only effectual one. If we have energy and spirit to take it, it will fill our ranks and augment our regular establishment certainly and expeditiously. The people will justify the measure, because they will feel that it is necessary to the maintenance of the honor, the character, and independence, of the country. The plan of the committee, though less efficient, is, in my humble opinion, better than that of the Senate. Where it fails to give you men it will give you money. It will be certain to give some men, and some money. I hope the House will agree to strike out the section.

War Measures.

Mr. CALHOUN briefly replied to the call made upon him by Mr. TROUP for the reasons why he preferred acting on the bill; that reason he thought was very obvious; that the bill, having met the approbation of the Senate, would, if it passed this House, immediately become a law. Policy appeared to him to require a preference of this bill to that reported by the committee of this House. If the Senate send us one bill, and we, instead of acting on it, send them another, it would place the two Houses in an awkward predicament. It seemed to him, he said, that the whole argument of the gentlemen against this bill was misplaced. This bill, as well as the gentleman's bill, would produce a certain number of recruits for the regular Army. Should the bill reported by the gentleman prevail, it would give us either regulars or money; if this bill should pass, we shall have regulars or good militia. Both bills were calculated to produce regulars, if they could be obtained by purchase. If absolute certainty was the object of the gentleman, it could be only obtained by resorting to a regular and fair system of conscription. To the result of any other system, whether that reported by the Military Committee of this House, or that now under consideration, some uncertainty must attach. The bill from the Senate promising as much certainty as that reported in this House, he hoped it would be gone through with and finally passed.

The question was then taken, without further debate, on the motion to strike out the first section of the bill, and decided as follows—for the motion 62, against it 64. So the motion to strike out the first section was negatived.

The following is the apportionment of the proposed draught of men among the several States and Territories:

From New Hampshire, two thousand five hundred eighty.

From Massachusetts, eight thousand six hundred five.

From Vermont, two thousand five hundred eighty.

From Rhode Island, eight hundred sixty.

From Connecticut, three thousand ten.

From New York, eleven thousand six hundred fifteen.

From New Jersey, two thousand five hundred eighty.

From Pennsylvania, nine thousand eight hundred ninety-five.

From Delaware, eight hundred sixty.

From Maryland, three thousand eight hundred seventy.

From Virginia, nine thousand eight hundred ninety-five.

From North Carolina, five thousand five hundred ninety.

From South Carolina, three thousand eight hundred seventy.

From Georgia, two thousand five hundred eighty.

From Kentucky, four thousand three hundred.

From Ohio, two thousand five hundred eighty.

From Tennessee, two thousand five hundred eighty.

From Louisiana, four hundred thirty.

From the Mississippi Territory, five hundred twenty-two.

From the Indiana Territory, five hundred forty-nine.

From the Illinois Territory, two hundred thirteen.

From the Michigan Territory, sixty.

From the Missouri Territory, three hundred seventy-six.

And from the Territory of Columbia, four hundred thirty.

Mr. JENNINGS moved to amend the apportionment for Indiana Territory, by striking out five hundred and forty-nine and inserting three hundred. The motion was opposed by Mr. RHEA of Tennessee, and negatived, 20 or 30 members only rising in favor of it.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, moved to strike out the present apportionment of the District of Columbia, viz: four hundred and thirty, and insert eighty, which he said would be at the rate of every twenty-fifth man. This motion was opposed by Mr. RHEA, and negatived.

Mr. MCKEE, of Kentucky, moved to strike out the 7th section of the bill, (which limits the services to be required of the draughted militia, to the bounds of their own and any adjoining State, with the exception of the Western States, who are, when required, to serve in Louisiana, and those of Pennsylvania and Virginia, in like manner, in the Michigan Territory, &c.) He could not see any possible benefit to arise from it, but he could see great inconvenience. It might frequently be important that the militia of one State should serve in a State which was not adjoining to theirs, and in some sections of the country might refuse their co-operation in such case, sheltering themselves under the provisions of this act.

This motion was seconded by Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, who thought this section calculated to excite feelings of dissention, and State and local prejudices. We ought to legislate as if for a nation, and not for State authorities. We ought to encourage national feeling, not sectional views. He should like to see that feeling diffused through the nation, which prevails in some parts of the Union, that would induce the citizens freely to march from one extreme to another to meet the enemy, rather than he should hold a foot of the soil. But when you recognise the principle that the militia of one State, say Massachusetts, shall not, on occasion, be liable to march for the defence of the shores of another, say Maryland or Virginia, or that the militia of the State of Kentucky or Tennessee should not, if necessary, march to the defence of Massachusetts, you sanction a local State feeling, which will be the bane of the prosperity of the nation. The States West of the mountains, and those East of the Potomac, were as much sister States, he said, as if they lay contiguous to each other. From the mode of legislation embraced in this section, Mr. S. feared the excitement of sentiments hostile to the grandeur of the character of this nation, as well as to its honor, both of which could only be attained by an amalgamation of national feeling.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked that, even were the section stricken out, it would not materially vary the nature of the service of these militia forces, which would be confined to their respective States, unless necessity required their service elsewhere; in which case such a limitation as is contained in the bill would be very inconvenient. He, therefore, concurred in the opinion that the section ought to be stricken out.

Mr. KILBOURN, of Ohio, supported the motion to strike out the 7th section. He conceived the militia service already sufficiently injured, if not dishonored, by the construction of the Constitution which had limited its utility. He hoped it would not be further restricted in such a provision as this. To show its injurious tendency, he instanced the case, which might happen, of the militia of New Jersey being called on to cross the Delaware, to aid in the defence of Pennsylvania or Delaware; the enemy retiring across an imaginary line into the State of Maryland, to regain their ships in the Chesapeake, the militia would, under this section, be precluded from pursuing them beyond the line, unless it suited their pleasure.

The question on striking out the 7th section was decided in the affirmative by a large majority.

Several other unimportant amendments were proposed, giving rise to desultory discussion, which were variously disposed of.

Mr. KING, of North Carolina, moved to amend the bill, so as not to confine the Governors of States, in the selection of the officers to command the militia to be draughted in pursuance of the bill, to the present militia officers.

This motion was supported by the mover, and by Messrs. FORSYTH of Georgia, FISK and SHIPHERD of New York, and GHOLSON of Virginia, on the ground of the expediency of allowing the widest field for the selection of officers qualified for command, without confining it to the militia officers now in commission, many of whom, though highly respectable men, were unfit for military command, having been selected in a time of peace, without reference to their military qualifications.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. CANNON and RHEA of Tennessee, PEARSON of North Carolina, and PICKERING of Massachusetts, on the ground of alleged injustice to the merits of our present militia, on Constitutional scruples, and on the difficulty which would be presented by the variance of the modes of appointment in the different States.

The motion was at last negatived—43 voting in favor of it.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, moved to strike out two years, the proposed term of service of the militia to be draughted in pursuance of this bill and insert six months. The motion was negatived by the following vote: For the motion 45, against it 82.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the bill was so amended as to make the officers of the draughted militia eligible, according to the Constitution and laws of the several States.

This bill having been gone through, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the Senate, "further to provide for filling the ranks of the Army of the United States."

[This is the bill that has occasioned so much debate in the Senate, and which authorizes the enlistment of minors.]

The bill having been read through, a motion was made by Mr. PIRKIN, of Connecticut, to strike out so much of the bill as authorizes the enlistment of minors over eighteen years of age, without the consent of their parents or guardians; which motion he supported by a few pertinent remarks.

This motion was opposed by Mr. HOPKINS, of Kentucky, in a short speech of much force and energy.

It was negatived by the following vote: For the motion 51, against it 83.

The House then proceeded to consider the bill, authorizing the President to accept the services of certain volunteer corps, (which bill was before the House some weeks ago for several days.) On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, this bill was then so amended, as to reinstate it precisely in the form in which it stood before it underwent amendment by the House.

The Committee then rose, and reported to the House the three bills they had had under consideration.

The first of those bills, viz: the bill from the Senate, requiring a draught for two years of a body of militia, was, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, referred to a select committee for their consideration.

The second of the above bills being before the House, and the question being on the engrossing of the bill for a third reading—

The House adjourned without deciding thereon.

SATURDAY, December 3.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to authorize the purchase of the library of Thomas Jefferson, late President of the United States;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. McKEE reported a bill, giving further time to the purchasers of public lands to complete their payments; and a bill for the relief of the heirs of James Hynum; which were twice read and committed.

The bill to extend Oliver Evans's patent for steam engines, was twice read and committed.

INCOME TAX.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives, instructing them to inquire into the "expediency of laying a duty on all salaried officers, and on the professional income of lawyers, solicitors, and counsellors, and on the legal proceedings of courts of justice," made the following report:

That a tax upon salaries can only be expedient and proper under arbitrary Governments, where pensions and places are bestowed without a just regard to the public interest. In the United States, according to the principles of our Government, no salary can be allowed, except as a compensation for public service; a tax operates as a deduction from the salary, and such a tax, so far as respects the officers of the United States, would be an admission on the part of the legislative body, that, in fixing the salaries of their public officers, the public interest had been disregarded, and more than a just compensation allowed. Without deciding whether in some instances this may not be the case, the committee are of opinion that, if the evil exists, the proper Constitutional remedy is not a tax, but a reduction of the salaries. The second member of the resolution embraces the income of lawyers, solicitors, and counsellors. The selection of a particular class of the community, which already pays, in common with others, a tax on property and on consumption, and imposing on it an income tax, from which every other class is exempted, would be a departure from that system of equal and exact justice, which ought to form the basis of legislation in a free country. The third member of the resolution proposes a tax on the legal proceedings of courts. This tax, if confined to the Courts of the United States, would be unproductive; if extended to the State Courts, difficult in the collection. It would fall principally on the necessitous and unfortunate, and produce collision with the State authorities. Upon the whole, it is considered inexpedient to resort to either of the proposed taxes. The following resolution is, therefore, submitted:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to impose a duty on salaried officers, on the income of lawyers, or on the proceedings of courts at law.

The report was ordered to lie on the table.

MONEYS RECEIVABLE FOR TAXES.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of providing by law, that any kind of money paid by the Government to the troops in the service of the United States, for military services, shall be receivable from the people in payment of taxes, made the following report:

That, under the general power to regulate the collection of taxes, the Secretary of the Treasury is preparing instructions to the collectors, in which a uniform rule as to the receipt of bank notes will be prescribed. The committee consider that it would be unsafe to designate, by law, the notes in which taxes shall be received, and that a due regard for the public interest requires that this subject should be regulated, at present, by instructions issued, from time to time, from the Treasury Department; which may be so framed, as to unite the safety of the revenue with the accommodation of the individual citizens. A statement of the circumstances which produced the resolution drawn up by the Representatives of Tennessee, together with a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanies this report; and the committee submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to designate, by law, the bank notes which shall be receivable in payment of taxes.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 23, 1814.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated the 21st instant, enclosing a resolution of the House of Representatives, passed the 11th instant, directing an inquiry "into the expediency of providing by law, that any kind of money which may be paid by the Government to the troops in the service of the United States, for military services, shall be receivable in payment from the people in taxes."

In the course of an endeavor to ascertain the grounds of the resolution, I have been favored with a communication from the Representatives of Tennessee in Congress, (of which a copy is annexed,) in addition to the general information possessed in this Department; and I believe that the facts of the case are briefly these: The Secretary of War, having occasion for money to pay the militia who marched from Tennessee against the Creek Indians, obtained a loan in bank notes, for that purpose, from the Bank of Chillicothe. Some of these notes have since been offered in the payment of taxes to the collectors of the internal duties in the State of Tennessee; but, as the banks of Tennessee (where the money collected for taxes is required to be deposited) refuse to receive them as cash deposits, the collectors, in their turn, refuse to receive them as cash for taxes. Owing to the causes suggested in the communication to which I have already referred, and, perhaps, to other causes, perfectly consistent with the general solvency of the Bank of Chillicothe, the notes circulating in Tennessee have suffered a considerable depreciation. They have already been, it is alleged, an object of speculation; those paid by the United States to the militia cannot now be distinguished from other notes issued by the Bank of Chillicothe; and any attempt to give the former a preference, in the payment of taxes, would probably increase the arts of speculation, as well as the other inconveniences of which the citizens of Tennessee complain.

Under these circumstances the case is, obviously, one of great delicacy. The Government has passed the notes at their nominal value; but it is equally true, that the Government is bound to pay for them to the bank according to their nominal value. The Government did not contract any engagement to support the credit of the notes, nor to accept them in payment of duties at any subsequent period; and all the persons who have accepted the notes, either in payment from the Government, or by transfer from the militia, have done so voluntarily, without any pretence of reliance upon any such engagement. If, therefore, it should be deemed proper to direct, by the legislative authority, that the notes of the Bank of Chillicothe shall be received in payment for duties, the principle of the direction will be equally applicable to every other case where the Government has paid its troops or creditors in bank notes, which have afterwards suffered (from whatever cause) a depreciation in credit or circulating value. The effect of such a law, upon the public revenues, need not be particularly stated.

Considering the subject, however, as a general subject, meriting the serious attention of the Treasury Department, I am preparing instructions to the collectors, to regulate their conduct in receiving bank notes for taxes. The design of the instructions will be, to unite the security of the revenue with the accommodation of the banks, as well as of individual citizens, during the disordered condition of the circulating medium of the country; and, in making this arrangement, I shall be highly gratified to find that the views of the mover of the resolution under consideration can be accomplished.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CONGRESS HALL, November, 1814.

SIR: It may be satisfactory to you to be informed of the situation of the banks in the State of Tennessee. There are two banks in that State—one at Knoxville, and the other at Nashville; both of them of unquestionable credit and solvency. No suspension has taken place of specie payments, nor do we believe any suspension will take place.

With respect to the Bank of Chillicothe, in the notes of which most of the troops in the service of the United States, from the State of Tennessee, have been paid, we can only observe, that no doubt was entertained of its solvency and ability to discharge its respective engagements, so far as we have been informed; but the notes would not circulate without considerable discount. This, we think, was produced in consequence of the course of trade being from the Southwest, Eastwardly, and Northeast, and money was not wanted at Chillicothe by the citizens of the mercantile towns in Tennessee, and not by any doubt existing of the solvency of the bank.

As these notes do not suit the commercial relations existing between the citizens of Tennessee and the Eastern States, we do not wish them to be further used in the payment of troops there.

The refusal, by the Government, to receive them again in the payment of taxes, has necessarily produced considerable irritation, and it is believed, by some of the people there, to be an intentional attempt to impose on them.

The spirit of patriotism and military ardor, now existing in as high a degree as in any part of the United States, is sinking under the injustice of this measure.

We have the honor to be, &c.

PETITION OF NOAH SHAW.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the petition of Noah Shaw, made the following report:

That the facts necessary for forming an opinion on the case, are stated in a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which accompanies this report. From this statement it appears that the petitioner is not entitled to relief under the special act of Congress, passed on the second day of January, 1812; and that the former Secretary refused, under the general law of the 3d of March, 1797, to remit the forfeiture incurred by the petitioner, on the ground, that it did not appear to his satisfaction that the forfeiture was incurred without wilful negligence, or any intention of fraud. On a review of the circumstances, the committee concur in opinion with the late Secretary of the Treasury, that the petitioner is not entitled to relief. The following resolution is therefore submitted.

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
November 4, 1814.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 28th ultimo, I have the honor to state, from the documents which accompany the reference of the Committee of Ways and Means, and from the facts ascertained at the Treasury Department, that, in the 1813, Noah Shaw, on behalf of Samuel Salsbury and A. P. Cleaveland, of Boston, presented a petition to the judge of the district court for the district of Vermont, setting forth, that Salsbury and Cleaveland, on the 9th of June, 1811, had imported into the province of Upper Canada, from Liverpool, in England, certain goods, specified in the invoice annexed, which they afterwards, on the 5th of March, 1813, imported into Burlington, in the district of Vermont; that the goods being owned by citizens, were imported into Canada on board of a ship which departed from Liverpool between the 23d of June and the 15th of September, to wit: on the 1st of August, 1811; and that the goods were purchased in Great Britain before the war was there known to exist.

That, on the 20th of November, 1813, the district judge certified to the Secretary of the Treasury the petition and the proofs, but he made no statement of facts; and, on the 12th of July, 1814, the Secretary of the Treasury decided, in form, not to remit the forfeiture incurred by the importation of the goods into the United States.

That it appears by the petition which Noah Shaw has recently presented to Congress, that Salsbury and Cleaveland had sold the goods to B. and C. Adams, on the 22d of September, 1812, from whom they were purchased by Noah Shaw, on the 11th of January, 1813, with a view to the importation, which he effected in the ensuing month of March.

Upon these facts I take the liberty to offer the following observations, for the consideration of the committee:

1. That, from the terms of the petition to the district judge, it appears that Mr. Shaw intended to seek relief, as for Salsbury and Cleaveland, under the special act of the 2d of January, 1813, directing the remission of certain forfeitures; and the prayer of the petitioner is, therefore, for relief according to the law in such case made and provided. The case, however, was certainly not embraced by the special act; for the goods were not imported into the United States from the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; they were not shipped on board of a vessel which departed therefrom between the 23d of June and the 15th of September, 1812; and, so far as respects Mr. Shaw, the owner at the time of the importation, the purchase of the goods was made long after the war was known to exist at the place of purchase.

2. That, although the case was not embraced by the special act, it became, properly, a question, whether the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to remit, or mitigate, the forfeiture, under the general law of the 3d of March, 1797, in his opinion, it was incurred without wilful negligence, or any intention of fraud. It does not appear that the late Secretary objected merely to an irregularity in the mode of exhibiting the facts, or of transmitting the documents; for, then, he would not have decided the case, but he would have returned it to the district judge, to undergo the necessary revision and amendment in point of form. Nor does it appear, from any information within my reach, that the Secretary decided the case upon any doubt of his jurisdiction to remit the forfeiture. The case must therefore be deemed to have been decided on its merits; and the power of the Secretary of the Treasury being once executed, the department cannot afterwards modify, or rescind, or change, the decision.

It will remain, upon this general view of the subject, for the committee to decide, whether the petitioner ought to be recommended for relief to Congress. The danger of giving a sanction to speculations which involve an unauthorized intercourse with the enemy, and the tendency of such speculations to cover and countenance the worst kind of smuggling, will, no doubt, be duly considered. If, indeed, the case had been originally presented for my official interposition, I should have reflected well before I decided, that, in principle, and in circumstances, it was entitled to the equitable relief of the act of the 3d of March, 1797. That act was meant to provide for cases of mere accident or misfortune, and for cases uncontaminated by any fraudulent intention, when the necessary rigor of the general law would become, in the particular instance, an instrument of hardship and cruelty. But no man is ever permitted to obtain relief in the courts of justice, upon a claim founded in his own wilful violation of the law; and it would be an extraordinary, and, I presume, a novel application of the equitable powers of the Secretary of the Treasury, to legitimate a trade with the enemy, through the medium of remitting penalties and forfeitures incurred by a breach of the non-importation acts.

I have the honor to be, &c.

A. J. DALLAS.

Hon. J. W. EREX, Chairman, &c.

The report was ordered to lie on the table.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill "making further provision for filling the ranks of the Army of the United States."

Mr. PERKIN, of Connecticut, made a motion, the object of which was to strike out of the bill that part of it which makes binding the enlistment of all persons from eighteen to fifty years of age.

A long debate ensued, in which Messrs. KING, of Massachusetts, WARD, GROSVENOR, and WEBSTER, were the principal speakers against the bill; and Messrs. FISK, SHARP, and BARNETT, its principal defenders.

Mr. CYRUS KING, of Massachusetts, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I think it my duty to make to the House some observations on the bill now under discussion, in connexion with other military bills and some of the revenue bills, which have been reported, as I deem the whole of your war system either against the enemy or the people of this country. This mode of considering the subject will do justice to the Administration, and to their friends in the respective Houses of Congress. And this justice I am disposed to render to them, notwithstanding I believe that, by some of their past acts, they have proved themselves the very worst enemies of the American people. This view, sir, I wish to submit to the House, if it be possible steadily to look at this system of military conscription, and of oppressive taxation, and not startle at the destruction with which it threatens our country.

A sagacious political writer, in speaking of the errors and oppressions of rulers, has remarked, that the necessity of any Government is the greatest reflection upon the virtue of the people; but, sir, with all due deference, I never shall consider that as the greatest reflection, as long as a people can be found so degraded, so regardless of their own interest and importance, as to tolerate an Administration after they shall have failed to accomplish the very end of their institution, and shall have raised their parricidal arm against the very instrument by which they have their existence. That this is the case with the present Administration, a little more reflection, and some more suffering, if it be possible to add to it, will convince the American people.

Take, if you please, sir, the ordinary evidence of a well-administered Government, respect abroad and prosperity at home, and ask yourself if this Administration have continued these blessings to this nation. That our form of Government, when correctly administered agreeably to the Constitution, is capable of producing, and for a time continuing, these national blessings, we have the splendid example of the Administrations of Washington, and of Adams, before his fall. Are you now respected abroad? No, sir, there is not a nation, not a crowned head in Europe, that is friendly towards you. I ask pardon, sir, there is perhaps one—I mean the great Emperor of the little island of Elba; but even he is now said, like Milton's devil, to eye you askance, and to grin horribly at the destruction which he has brought upon you. How you alienated foreign nations from you is now matter of history; by constantly aiding the attempts of the late fell tyrant of Europe at universal empire, your destinies were united with his, and you must now expect to share with him the general detestation of mankind. But, sir, what will forever fix your character in Europe, and I think your doom at home, is your rash declaration of war at the time you did it;—thus, like willing slaves, binding yourselves to the then triumphal car of the enslaver of nations. Yes, sir, you courageously declared your war when you supposed the imperial tyrant had his victim bound at his feet, and the sword out and whetted that was to be plunged into her vitals. You then magnanimously expected to be in at the death and share the spoils. Sir, the rashness and folly of this Administration, on that occasion, forcibly reminds us of the fable of the madman, who undertook to shear a wolf. What, exclaimed his friends, shear a wolf! Have you considered the danger and difficulty of the undertaking, and the little profit you are likely to gain if you succeed? No, says the madman, I have considered nothing but the right! The Sovereign of the Universe has given to man dominion over the beasts of the forest and of the field; I, therefore, have the right, and will shear the wolf.

So this Administration, believing that the imperial robber of France had the royal bull of England by the horns, thought they had a right, this a favorable opportunity, and attempted to shear him; but, most unfortunately for them, the royal beast broke from the imperial robber, trod him under foot, and is now pushing, with full vigor, at poor Mr. Madison and his friends.

Have you, sir, been more fortunate at home, in continuing the prosperity of this country and of its citizens? The bankruptcy of your Treasury, and the misery and groans of the people, pronounce an awful negative to this question. Still, in this ruined state of the country, and impoverished situation of the people, you call upon them for more men and more money. For this purpose numerous tax bills and military bills have been reported. And with these facts staring him in the face, your new Secretary, the fresh hand at the Treasury bellows, who has labored so hard to blow up public credit, had the effrontery to declare, in his first report, that the resources of the nation remain almost untouched by the hand of the Government; because I suppose his hand had not before touched them. And this, sir, is one of the evils attendant on the perpetual fluctuation of officers in some of your departments. No sooner is one leach brushed from the veins of the people than a fresh one is fastened on them, to suck the last drop of their blood.

You attempt to raise a revenue in two ways—by direct and indirect taxes—though the genius of the Administration, I think, leads them to the indirect mode, that the hand of the Government should as seldom as possible be seen by the people while they are picking their pockets. The justice of this mode may well be questioned. When you impose a direct tax every citizen knows what he has to pay; but when you tax articles in the hand of the manufacturer, the retailer, or the merchant, they add what they please, certainly never less than the tax, for advance of money and interest; and thus the citizen is often obliged to pay more than double the amount of the tax. Though indeed, sir, in the present impoverished situation of the people, I can see but little other difference in the two modes of taxation than between petit larceny and robbery. The disposition that would induce an Administration, at a time like this, to adopt the indirect mode would urge an unfortunate being, in humble life, clandestinely to pick a pocket or rob a hen roost; and the evil genius that would impel the former to resort to the direct mode, would embolden the latter to attack the citizen, and demand his money at the point of the bayonet, or the muzzle of the pistol.

[Mr. KING was here cautioned by the honorable SPEAKER not to violate that order and decorum in debate which the rules of the House require. Thanking the honorable Speaker for the caution, Mr. K. replied: This, sir, is a subject which I never will debate but with the Constitution in my hand. I will boldly march to the ex-

trepreneurial verge of its powers, and there be ready, at all times, to give to my political opponents a practical illustration of my ideas of the rights of a Representative and of the privilege of a member; I never will wantonly invade the territory of my adversary, nor, without a struggle, be driven from my own.]

On the subject of taxes, sir, your President, in his first Message at this session, says: "We have seen them (the people) everywhere paying their taxes, direct and indirect, with the greatest alacrity." And the late Secretary, Mr. Campbell, taking his pitch from the President, celebrates in the same strain, "the promptitude and cheerfulness with which the present taxes are paid." What reward, said Mr. K., do the people receive for all this patriotism and devotion to their country? You double their burdens, and increase your exactions. You have resolved to double your land tax, making it six millions of dollars; to double the auction and carriage taxes; to add fifty per cent. to the taxes on the retailers, and on the postage of letters and newspapers; it is natural, sir, that you should increase the latter tax; by taxing the press, many of the people will be compelled to give up their newspapers, and thus be less able to scrutinize the conduct of this Administration. On domestic distilled spirits, you have increased the tax four hundred per cent.; lest the people should obtain a drop of comfort from that source. And, to crown the whole, you have resolved to add twenty-one new items to your list of taxable articles. Many of which, such as the taxes on hats, leather, nails, iron, &c., will fall peculiarly heavy on those who are poorly able to pay. If such be the reward of their patriotism, you will compel the people to try the effect of a manly resistance to such oppression.

But happy, happy would it be for this distressed, this devoted people, if after thus depriving them of their property, in many cases of their last dollar, this Administration would be satisfied. No, but the people must then bestow their services, must surrender their bodies, and spill their blood for these ungrateful men, in carrying on this ruinous war. For this purpose sundry military bills have been reported; the three principal may be described as the conscription bill of the Senate; the conscription bill of the House; and that now under consideration, the minor conscription bill.

The great objection to all these bills is, that they confound the distinction made in the Constitution between the regular army and the militia; a subject upon which no mistakes can be made except such as are wilful. How did your predecessors, and how ought you to exercise the Constitutional power of raising armies? By voluntary enlistment of persons capable of contracting; for enlistment is only a contract. Congress has power "To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." Also—"To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasion." And when called into the actual service of the United States, the President shall be the Commander-in-Chief thereof. Now, sir, Congress has already passed laws for organizing the militia into divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions, and companies, and they have been organized accordingly. Also, for arming the militia, and which you have partially executed; and for some of the other purposes mentioned in the Constitution. They are then, sir, by your Constitution and laws, and they were such in most of the States before the Constitution was adopted, or your laws enacted, an independent, organized, armed, and disciplined corps, in the respective States, with an independent Commander-in-Chief over each. And, sir, Congress can now approach them in no other form, nor through any other channel than that of this independent commander; any law or laws of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding.

Now, sir, what do your first two bills contemplate? That from the Senate, which is drawn with great art, and may be abused to the worst of purposes, does indeed call upon the Executives of the States for their respective quotas of the militia required, but after that we hear no more of the State authority. The second section divides the whole militia into as many classes as there are soldiers required from each State, ordering each class to furnish one; the third section directs the commanders of companies what persons to enrol, and to make their returns to the Adjutant General of the United States; he is to send his orders to the commanders of brigades, and these again to the commanders of regiments, who are to issue their orders to commanders of companies, and they to see the draught made. And these State officers over whom you have no legal control, till called into your service, are to be fined, imprisoned, and cashiered, if they do not obey your illegal mandates: and all this without consulting their Constitutional Commanders-in-Chief. Now, sir, it is very certain, that if they do obey those mandates, they will be liable to fine and imprisonment, under the State laws; you therefore place them between two fires. And thus the poor militia officers are to be cut up, whether they obey or disobey.

But, sir, the conscription bill of the House is still more destructive of our militia; it goes, sir, to disband the whole; to melt it down to one common mass; and out of this chaos makes up little squads of twenty-five, each of which is, under severe penalties, to furnish a man during the war for the regular army. If, sir, you have a right thus to take a twenty-fifth, you may take the whole, and convert the whole militia into a standing or regular army, under the command of your President—thus completely annihilating the State sovereignties. The great mistake, is, sir, that you undertake to command the militia before they are, according to the Constitution, called into the actual service of the United States. To illustrate my meaning, suppose the case of two independent commanders under your laws, where one, in case of necessity, is required to support the other: take, if you please, the case of General Izard and General Brown. The latter has occasion for a thousand men from the command of the former; according to the bill from the Senate, Brown calls upon Izard for that number; but, lest Izard should not comply, he directs Izard's subordinate officers, without consulting their commander, to send him the number required, and threatens to cashier them if they do not instantly comply; or, according to the principle of the bill of the House, Brown goes to Izard's army, disbands the whole, cuts it up into twenty-fives, and takes one man from each. Do you suppose, sir, that such orders or such conduct would be submitted to? Are they not subversive of all military subordination, and destructive to our militia—the guardians of our rights and liberties? I again repeat, sir, that the militia of each State are an independent, organized, and armed corps, with an independent Commander-in-Chief over each; that you must approach them as such; and I will add, that if you attempt to do it in any other manner, you will be received at the point of the bayonet.

The necessity of considering the militia in this light is apparent, it is the physical force of the State to defend it against all aggressions, liable to be called upon at a moment's warning; but if the United States can thus interfere with it at pleasure, take such part as they please, and garble it to suit their purposes, they will ruin the system, and deprive the States of their only protection. A State suddenly invaded, and an instant call upon an adjoining State becomes necessary, what will you do without an organized militia, to fly to the relief of such State? Or what will you do for one, if your present plans are adopted? Besides, sir, is not the State commander of the militia the best judge from what part of his command, on a call, the troops can most safely be detached? But your plans go to take the militiamen indiscriminately from every part of the State, although a large proportion of them may be on duty, or a part of the State invaded. Such arbitrary plans can only be calculated to destroy the militia system, and of course the sovereignties of the States. The militia system of New England, sir, is almost coeval with its settlement, and I trust in God, and on the valor of her sons, that it will be co-extensive with her existence.

But, sir, the principle embraced in the minor conscription bill, is the most inhuman, immoral, and oppressive, that ever was attempted to be established by this, and, of course, by any other assembly, called deliberative. I mean, sir, the authority intended to be given to your recruiting officers to enlist minors, without the consent, or even against the will of the parent, master or guardian; in other words, and in effect, if carried, to steal the ward from the guardian, entice the apprentice from his master, and to seduce the child from his parent; and thus destroy, "all the charities of father, son, and brother." Where were the feelings of the father, when the cold politician could recommend such a horrid principle; nay a father could not, a christian would not do it.

And, sir, besides outraging the best feelings of the heart, the principle violates several important provisions of the Constitution. Suppose, sir, an opposer of the Constitution had inquired of its friends, before its adoption, how the power to raise armies was to be exercised; his answer must have been by the voluntary and fair enlistment of persons capable of contracting; this would have satisfied the parent, master, and guardian, because they would have shown that their wards, apprentices, and children, under twenty-one, were incapable of forming such contract. Can you then, sir, against common law and common right, by any act of yours, confer a capacity to enlist, or contract, which did not exist at the information of the Constitution? Sir, the illustration so pointedly stated by my honorable friend and colleague (Mr. WARD) in a different manner, respecting married women, had occurred to me, in relation to their inability to contract. You have occasion, in your armies, for women to attend the sick, and to nurse some of your old generals; suppose you should, by law, attempt to authorize your officers to recruit some women for these necessary purposes, and as married women are generally most experienced, you should instruct your officers to contract with such, without the consent of their husbands. Do you suppose that such a law ought to be executed? Should you imagine it Constitutional? If not, neither is it so in regard of minors, for they no more than married women, can, by law, contract; nor can you any more confer the capacity upon the one, than upon the other.

Besides, sir, by the Constitution, "no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts;" you will not contend that this prohibition to the several States, confers the power on the United States; because, but for the prohibition, it would have been reserved to the States or people, though, I trust in God, never to have been exercised. But pass this law, and you not only impair, but dissolve a thousand solemn contracts, now authorized by law, between parents, masters, and guardians. You attempt to do more—impiously to sever that tie between parents and children, formed by the finger of God, in the heart of man.

It is no answer to say that the master is to receive part of the bribe, which is to entice his apprentice from him; for we deny your right thus to entice or enlist him. It is well that you do not thus insult the parent by offering him some of the pieces of silver, which are to betray his child from him—the price of blood. Though he too has a property in the service of the child till twenty-one, which you cannot take "for public use without just compensation."

Believe me, sir, as your laws now stand, this war has already introduced into private families, too much distress. On this very subject of enlisting minors, the most inhuman and distressing acts have been perpetrated by some of your recruiting officers. Minors have been often enlisted without the consent of their parents; and when these parents have demanded them of your officers, they have laughed them to scorn; and when they have called in the civil authority to enforce their demands, it has been resisted by force of arms; and the unhappy youth marched off, in the dead of night, and concealed from his parent. And when, driven by the severity of his officers, the suffering child has fled to his paternal mansion for protection, that mansion, the castle of his parent, has been surrounded at night by ruffian soldiers, its sanctity violated, its doors burst open, and the struggling child torn from the arms of his distracted mother. Another instance, I know, where a child, enticed away and enlisted, ran to the arms of his father for safety—the father and son were waylaid by armed soldiers in the woods, were attacked with swords and pistols, and the suffering child forcibly taken from the wounded parent.

If these cruelties are inflicted contrary to law, what accumulation of distress may we not anticipate, when they shall be authorized by law? I speak of facts which I do know, of distresses of daily occurrence, of crimes which have wrung the father's heart with anguish, and filled his house with misery and woe.

This act, sir, authorizes your recruiting officers to enlist into your army, any free, effective, able-bodied man, between the ages of eighteen and fifty. Now, sir, what kind of a free, able-bodied man, is a stripling of eighteen, under the authority of his parent, or bound to a master. I agree with the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. HOPKINS,) whose zeal and intelligence I have often admired, (they, I think, were misapplied here,) that the minor contemplated by this bill, is not

"The infant
Mewling and puling in his nurse's arms."

Nor, sir, can, or ought he to be—a "Soldier,

Full of strange oaths, and bearded like the pard,
Jealous in honor, sudden and quick in quarrel,
Seeking the bubble reputation
Even in the cannon's mouth."

I would ask that honorable gentleman, what such a stripling would do in battle, opposed to his huge frame and nervous arm? Could he turn your bayonet, or stop the descending sword? Believe me, he could not. No, sir, boys of that age cannot bear the hardships of a camp, much less can they withstand the shock of battle, or breast the storm of war.

If what I have urged will not induce you to arrest the progress of this bill, I appeal to you—I beseech you, as friends of humanity, to spare the tears which the passage of this law will cause to flow; I appeal to you as fathers, by every endearing tie which binds you to your children, not to deprive the aged parent of the child of his youth, the support and solace of his declining years, lest you bring his gray hairs with sorrow to the grave.

I entreat you to make the case your own—suppose a darling child, an only son, snatched from you by the scourge of war—in the language of grief and of nature, you will then exclaim: "Would to God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!"

James Madison, President of the United States, is the father of this system of conscription for America, as his unfortunate friend Bonaparte was of that of France; this he announced in his Message, before referred to, as follows:

"I earnestly renew, at the same time, a recommendation of such changes in the system of militia, as, by classing and disciplining for the most prompt and active service the portions most capable of it, will give to that great resource for the public safety all the requisite energy and efficiency."

His plans therefor, substantially embraced by these conscription bills, were afterwards submitted to Congress, by his Secretary of War, James Monroe, and by him attempted to be recommended to the American people, by the plea of necessity:

"So spake the fiend, and, with necessity,
The tyrant's plea, excus'd his devilish deeds."

Your President further says, in the same Message: "We see the people rushing with enthusiasm to the scenes where danger and duty call. In offering their blood, they give the surest pledge that no other tribute will be withheld." If this be true, sir, where is the necessity of violating the Constitution to impose upon the people a military despotism and French conscription? That it is true, in one sense, the acknowledged and tried virtue and patriotism of the people are proof. But it is at the call of the State authorities (now our only efficient rulers) that they fly to arms, to defend the soil, and everything dear to them; this they are able, this they are ready, this they are determined to do, against all invaders—not, however, as a tribute to Nero, but as a sacred duty to themselves and their country.

As to the patriotism and devotion of the people to their country, we hear much said by gentlemen on both sides of the House; and comparisons, too often odious, have been made between the relative patriotism of the West and North; these sectional views I regret as much as any one, especially, when rendered necessary by the constant oppression, by the Administration, of particular sections of the country. The Governors of New England have been traduced, because they would not fall down and worship the idols of Democracy, while the gentlemen of the West have continually celebrated the devotion of their States to the powers that are. In the first and second session of the 13th Congress, we were almost deafened with their cry of patriotism and proffers of service; but, at this session, the tune appears to be a little changed; it is now said that the people must be encouraged; that it is wrong to expect them to save their country without a liberal compensation; in other words, no pay, no patriotism. Sir, I am disposed to do more than justice, if possible, to our brethren of the West; I most cordially acknowledge them as brethren; many of them are from New England; I know them to be hardy, bold, and enterprising. But, sir, it is a little unfortunate for our poor country, that the stock of patriotism of the West and our national Treasury should both be exhausted at the same moment. I cannot say that there was any very intimate connexion between them, or that the one received its aliment from the other. I only mention facts which have been announced on this floor.

Pause for a moment, sir, and reflect upon the manner in which you have attempted to raise and recruit your Army, for carrying on this ruinous war. At first, you appealed to the patriotism of the people to support you in this rash measure, and expected to raise an army by offering the usual bounty and wages; disappointed in that expectation, you next attempted to buy soldiers, and authorized your recruiting officers to give for them in bounty, land, and wages, about the value of a prime slave in the South. And those who were tempted, by the price only, to sell themselves to you, except to save their families from starving, deserve to be slaves. Thus baffled in all your attempts to enlist the people on your side, in this war, you intend, by these conscription bills, sticking to the slave principles still, to kidnap the people, as you would slaves; and they will deserve this fate, if they tamely submit to such oppression.

We were gravely told, the other day, by an honorable gentleman, (Mr. BARNETT,) in debate, that this was the people's war; that they must and should come out and fight their own battles. It was, I think, sir, but a poor compliment to the people of this country, to call an act theirs, passed by so lean a majority of their Representatives. No, sir, you passed the act declaring war at your peril, as you pass every other law; if it be salutary, if it prove beneficial to the country, the people will support you; if not, the disgrace and ruin ought to fall upon your own heads. That honorable gentleman said further, that they had heretofore fed the people with soft corn; that is, treated them too kindly, rendered them too prosperous and happy. What, in the name of God, does the honorable gentleman mean by this? What species of distress, what complication of misery, have you failed to bring upon the people, in the last seven years? A whole apprenticeship of wretchedness. Have you not destroyed their commerce, paralyzed their industry, loaded them with taxes, (after depriving them of the ability to pay,) forced them into your ranks to support their wives and children, subjected them to frequent and harassing calls for militia service, often discharged them therefrom without clothing or pay, far from their families and friends, sick, distressed, and wounded? And what, let me ask, is the situation of a whole army in the North, so pathetically described by an honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. INGHAM,) at this inclement season of the year, in that severe, cold climate, destitute of clothes, with nothing to cover them but the heavens; no friendly mansion to receive their wounded bodies, unless the friendly earth, in compassion of their suffering, should open her bosom, and receive them and their miseries forever!

If this, sir, be to treat the people with soft corn, I pray that honorable gentleman to give it to his slaves, and not to freemen. But he further remarked, that they have been hitherto daubing the people with untempered mortar. There, sir, I perfectly agree with him. When the great Jefferson, (I mean great in theory, but little in fact, the author of the Declaration of Independence, and the hero of Carter's Mountain,) in his Inaugural Address, in honeyed, though deceitful accents, which never ought to be forgotten by his friend, or forgiven by the friends of our country, said, we are all Federalists, all Republicans—all white, all black—he daubed the people with untempered mortar. Mr. Madison (the destroyer of Washington, as he would be of every one that bore his name or revered his virtues) following the example of his great predecessor, has, in many of his Messages, and by many of his acts, daubed the people with untempered mortar; and you have attempted to build up your party with untempered mortar, until the political fabric, like the remains of the edifices around us, is tumbling into ruin.

We have, indeed, sir, fallen on evil times, and this is a strange Government under which we suffer. Our Constitution is beautiful in theory. In reading it we should suppose that the people were everything, and that it could not fail of rendering them prosperous and happy, as indeed it did, under the wise administration of WASHINGTON; but, since it has fallen into the hands of its enemies, it appears to be entirely changed. As now administered, we should suppose that the people were made for the Government, not the Government for the people, and, that the great duty of the people was to maintain a corrupt Administration, with its thousand dependants and hungry expectants, in idleness and dissipation. You tax the people, you deprive them of employment and property; you fight your battles with the people, and when your severity forces them to desert, you shoot them by dozens. And all this is done in the name and for the good of the people. "We, the people," stand first in the Constitution, and the last to receive any benefit from it.

When, sir, gentlemen on this side of the House have, in behalf of the people, accused Mr. Madison and some of his Cabinet of high crimes and misdemeanors, the friends of these men have referred them to the Constitution for their impeachment and punishment. Cruel insult and mockery! Impeachment? Who, in the name of God, are to vote and carry up—I ask pardon, sir, I should say down—everything in this strange Government is sadly turned topsy-turvy—who, I repeat, in the name of God, are to vote and carry down articles of impeachment against these high offenders? Is it not the majority on this floor; the fast friends of the Executive; the advisers and abettors of some of the most oppressive acts of which we complain? Will they vote articles of impeachment which go to criminate themselves? It is too much to expect of poor human nature, constituted as it is. If, however, returning to a sense of justice and of duty to the people—and I well know that I violate all probability by the supposition—the majority should be induced to perform this sacred office, after this Grand Inquest for the body of the nation, as it is sometimes called, have found a true bill, what is the body or petit jury which is to try it? Is it a packed jury? No, not so good; for then there would be a right of challenge; but the people must take them as they find them, unanointed, unannealed, with all their party and political sins about them. Yes, sir, when you approach the Senate of the United States you go one step nearer to the President, one step nearer the head of power, patronage, and corruption. The present majority in that body are the personal friends and advisers of the President; they are connected by official duties, confirm his nominations, extend the Executive patronage, whereby the offices of the people are made use of as instruments to debauch and corrupt them. Can you expect such a majority to find one of their friends guilty, when the same verdict would seal their own condemnation?

This consolidation of the different departments of Government, I must observe to you, sir, is one of the high crimes which this Administration has committed against the Constitution and the American people. For party and corrupt purposes, you have broken down the barriers interposed by the Constitution, for the safety of the people, between the several departments of power, whereby this Administration, including the majorities in both Houses of Congress, have become one unleavened lump of democracy and oppression. Not content with the Constitution, as you violently tore it from Washington and its other friends; not content with creeping under it, leaping over it, winding round it—now, sword in hand, attempting to pierce through it; you have so altered it, changed it, and mangled it, to suit your party views and purposes—to perpetuate your power and misrule—that the people no longer know or acknowledge it; no longer find under it protection for their property or safety for their lives. It is time then, sir, high time, for the people, in their turn, to look into this instrument; to see if they can heal the wounds which violence has inflicted on it—restore it to its pristine health and vigor; that they may, as at the beginning, find safety and protection under the shadow of the wings of the American Eagle.

If this Administration can, consistently with the provisions of the Constitution, ruin the country and oppress the people as they have done, that Constitution should, and must be changed. If, on the contrary, they have brought this ruin and oppression upon the country in open violation of that charter, once deemed sacred, then is this Administration, with James Madison at its head, a common nuisance, and ought to be abated by the people.

We still hear a feeble, though insidious cry of union. Union with whom? The present bankrupt, oppressive Administration? Believe me, gentlemen, you want no aid for that purpose; you are completing it as fast as time and your crimes will permit. You complain that avarice hoards, and that timidity locks up the money from you. No, gentlemen, you mistake; it is common sense and common prudence which keep it from the grasp of bankrupts and spendthrifts.

Sir, this country is in an alarming and awful situation. She is tottering on the brink of ruin. The people have, indeed, a difficult and painful labor and duty to perform, to protect themselves and their country against the desperate assaults of an oppressive and wicked Administration, and of an exasperated foreign enemy; but, with the blessing of Heaven on their exertions, they will triumph over all their enemies. It is now said, and I think with truth, that the salvation of this country depends upon the revival of its expiring credit. This the present men in power cannot accomplish. The Administration is bankrupt in means and resources, and they have ruined most of their friends who have loaned them money. In vain do they resort to the bubble of paper credit, which will burst with the very breath that blows it up; in vain do they turn their vacant stare on that huge spectre of a fifty million paper bank—that castle in the air, that baseless fabric of a vision, which must dissolve in thin air. No, sir; such visions will not meet or avert the dreadful calamity which surrounds us. There is but one mode, then, in which this nation can be saved. By placing, and that immediately, the nation in the hands and under the guardian care of men in whom the people have, and ought to have confidence; in the hands of men who, with Washington, before laid the foundation of public credit—which nothing but folly and wickedness could undermine; under the care of men who, with Washington at their head, and with his spirit and principles in their hearts, raised our Republic to glory and renown. But, mistake me not. No bribe can tempt, no office seduce, the true disciples of Washington to desert or betray their principles or their country. Nothing but the interest—nothing short of the salvation, of their country, could induce them to resume that authority, now so abused, which was insidiously wrested from them. Place such men in authority; put the destinies of the nation into their hands, and thousands of their friends will rally round their standard—not with empty professions of lives and fortunes, but with the free-will offering of their treasures and their blood.

Mr. GROSVENOR rose in reply to Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky.

Mr. G. said, that, impatient as the House appeared to be for the question, he could not suffer it to be taken without some animadversions upon the sentiments expressed by the honorable gentleman who had just sat down. Before he offered those, however, he would speak briefly to the propriety and Constitutionality of the provision under discussion. He confessed he had bestowed upon it no particular attention, as it had not been his purpose to take any part in the debate. He had thought that the reasoning of his honorable friend was conclusive against it upon Constitutional grounds; and he had hoped, that the distress which would be carried into domestic life, so eloquently described by the two gentlemen from Massachusetts, (Messrs. WARD and KING,) would reach the heart of every member, and compel him to reject the provision. But he was wholly mistaken. If, said Mr. G., anything could astonish me in this House, it would be the pertinacity with which this offensive provision is pressed upon us. The object to be obtained is so extremely trifling, as to render the ardor of pursuit as ridiculous as it is impolitic. I believe my friend from New Hampshire has gone to the very extent of the fact, when he has admitted that you might, possibly, by this provision, gain an accession of one thousand to your armies. Under the present law minors enlist. All that worthless description of young men, who have received their education in the tippling shops and the brothels, now go into your armies, and nobody reclaims them, because the camp is their proper element. Beyond this description, which you now have, if you gain an annual thousand you will exceed even your own expectation; and for this paltry gain you are about to adopt a principle, not only in the opinion of many unconstitutional, but, in practice, jeopardizing the good order of the community, violating contracts, disturbing the sacred rights of natural affection, and all the felicities of domestic life. My honorable friend from New Hampshire has characterized the proceeding as folly; I pronounce it a measure combining strong characters of weakness and violence, of folly and madness.

Is it Constitutional? The provision is, that all minors, of every condition, may, of their own mere will, contract to serve in your armies, and that such contract shall be conclusive and binding. By the laws of every State the age of minority is fixed, and no minor can make a valid and binding contract. Can you abrogate this State law? No, sir. To do so, was never delegated to you by the State or the people. All analogies from other Governments fail you. Yours is a Government, sovereign to be sure, but whose sovereignty is confined to particular subjects of legislation, and is limited by articles and sections. You have power to legislate upon no subjects, except such as are brought within your jurisdiction by the Constitution.

Sir, in what article or section of the Constitution do you find a power to enter the sanctuary of society, and frame municipal laws for this people? Where is your authority to give ability to the citizens to make contracts, which ability is forbidden by the municipal laws of the States? The ability to contract is the creature of municipal law; it is the subject of State legislation; it is exclusively reserved to the States, as sovereign States. And it is a direct subversion of the very frame of our Government to usurp that power, which exists not in the Constitution. Where will you stop? If you can, in defiance of State law, declare that a minor may make a binding contract, can you not, on the same principle, extend the time of minority, and declare that any contract by a man over the age of minority, as fixed by State laws, shall not be binding? May you not interfere with any other subject of municipal law? Why may you not abolish the statutes of usury in any State? Why not new model the laws of descent, and declare that the brother or a stranger shall inherit in preference to the son? And why not interfere with your remedial laws and regulations? Your principle bears you through all these usurpations; and if it be correct you may, if you have the courage to attempt it, steal away all the powers of the States, and render their sovereignties ridiculous phantoms. Sir, the attempt is usurpation, and must experience the same fate with other usurpations, with all arbitrary efforts to destroy the Constitution.

My friend from New Hampshire (Mr. WEBSTER) has said, that if you can enlist apprentices in defiance of their masters, you may also deliver the slave from his servitude. Is he not literally correct? Why may you not enlist the slave? Because, by the municipal laws of the States, he has not the power to contract. The same reason, precisely, forbids the enlisting of minors and apprentices. If you can remove the incapacity from the latter, so you may from the former. Will you say that the master has a property in the services of his slave? How has he that property? Solely by a State law. By the same law the master has a property in the service of the apprentice—the father in the minority of his son. And if you may abrogate the law and violate the property in the one case, you may do it in the other. Nor is there any distinction arising from the duties of native allegiance. I have already stated that the sovereign powers of Government, in this country, are divided; part rests with the States, and part with the Union. With the latter, rest those powers delegated in the Constitution; all the remainder are in the States or the people. The natural allegiance of the people is due to the State sovereignties; and that allegiance only is due to the Federal Government which is promised by the Constitution. In that Constitution the minor has promised no military duty, but that which is to be performed in the militia. In the militia he may be forced into the service of the United States, “to execute the laws, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion;” beyond this you cannot force him into your service; nor can you entice him by any contract, not sanctioned by his father, guardian, or master. I will not pursue the Constitutional objection to the bill any further.

But your right to adopt this provision has been argued on precedent; and the law of 1798 has been cited. Sir, could a thousand precedents of the violation of the Constitution be produced in your statute book, they would have no weight with me. These are not times to be influenced by those precedents which arose in the agitations of any period, or by the opinions of others, perhaps lightly formed and hastily expressed. The Constitution is now daily fooled to the very top of its bent. For purposes of unhallowed conquest, the Secretary of War, who seems to be at once the director general and organ of the Administration, has stretched all its limbs upon the rack of party, until it has spoken any and every language which its tormentor has dictated. This is not a moment for the sentinels of freedom to sleep, or to be deluded by idle opinion, or ill-advised precedent.

The provisions of the Constitution are before us. I will admit all the acknowledged rules of construction to obtain its legitimate meaning; but though precedents of its violation should be cited by the month, they should have no weight with me, however plausible or authoritative they may be deemed by others.

But even precedent is not to be found. What is the principle of the law of 1793? Citizens, "of able bodies and suitable age," might be enlisted "under the direction of the President." In point of fact, the President did direct that minors should not be enlisted. But suppose he had directed otherwise, and minors had been enlisted, their contracts were voidable under the State laws, and, on application, the State judges might, and frequently did, release them. If the enlisted minor had a parent, guardian, or master, either might, and frequently did, reclaim him from the service. How different is this act. Here you not only in express terms authorize the enlistment of minors, but you consider their contract of enlistment conclusive. You, in express terms, authorize the apprentice to violate the contract with his master; and you declare the master entirely without remedy. Have gentlemen considered the partial operation of this provision? Its effects will not be felt in the South, where manual labor is performed, not by hardy freemen but by slaves. It will not be felt in the South and the West, where manufactories, and consequently apprentices, are few; but it will fall with dreadful violence upon the North and the East, where the hardy owners of the soil rely upon their sons to till the earth; where manufactories of all descriptions, private and public, have suddenly multiplied beyond all parallel; and where the services of apprentices are all-important to their success. Certainly, if any act was ever justly odious, this will be most justly detested by the freemen of the North and East.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop; but I hope the House will bear with me while I bestow a few moments attention upon the speech of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. SHARP.) That gentleman has given his fancy a latitude of party crimination beyond the ordinary field of debate.

An honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WARD) had spoken of the domestic happiness, the social and maternal feelings, which this act would violate—of the heart-rending scenes that must occur, when the youth, who in a moment of feverish ambition, or giddy revelry, had enlisted, should be dragged from the embraces of his mother and sisters to the dangers of a Canadian war. Gentlemen who favor the bill have all appeared to me to treat this subject with too much levity.

Sir, the best feelings of our natures, those strong family affections which form at once the ligaments and felicities of social life, cannot be violated by any Government with impunity; and those measures which cause the tears of a whole nation to flow, cannot comport with its interests, its honor, or its durable prosperity. But these, it seems, will be the tears of women.

The age of chivalry may have departed, but the nature and affections of man remain unchanged. And the annals of the world will prove, that when by oppression and injustice tears are wrung from female eyes, it never can be long before they mingle with the blood of man. Let no Legislature forget, that so closely are the social affections knit together—so well are all our feelings and interests woven in the very frame of society, that the arm of the strong can never long be wanting to avenge the wrongs and protect the rights of the weak. While on this subject, I would say a word upon the refined lesson which has just been read by the gentleman from Kentucky to his countrywomen. He has recited, for their imitation, the address of a Spartan mother to her son, as he was departing on a marauding expedition: "Bring back this shield, or be brought back upon it."

I trust I am not insensible to sentiments or actions of heroism; but, whenever I have read this address, an emotion very different from admiration has always been prevalent in my mind.

Where were those claims of nature—those strong natural affections—which cling to the offspring with a force stronger than death? None of them resided in the bosom of that Spartan mother. Sir, I have often wondered, when I have heard the sentiments and conduct of the Spartan aristocracy cited for the imitation of a Christian Republic. They were a race, faithless, cruel, and barbarous; hateful and terrible to the rest of mankind. All their maxims were unjust and selfish, and all their institutions modelled on principles of immoral tendency; calculated only to extend the empire of ignorance, desolation, and revenge.

Why will not the honorable gentleman proceed, and cite, from the same polluted source, examples for the imitation of our youth? One great object of Spartan policy was to accomplish her youth in the useful science of thieving! It became a maxim, that to steal adroitly was meritorious; but, to be detected, was crime and ignominy. And no doubt many a Spartan mother has charged her son, upon the eve of some petty larceny expedition, Return successful and undetected, or return a corpse.

I have seen and have admired female heroism; but, that is not heroism which smothers in the female bosom those refined feelings—those fond attachments and divine affections—which constitute all there is of glory in woman, in her relations of daughter, wife, and mother. Give to the females of the Choctaw tribes the polished language of Greece, and they would turn you a sentence breathing the same spirit and feelings as that uttered by this Amazon of Sparta.

That our countrywomen should cherish the defenders of their country, is natural and noble. And when the defence of our rights is the sole question, even female timidity may assume defiance, and, with her own hand, arm the warrior for battle. But, no American mother can urge her son to the invasion of Canada—to carry misery to those whom the spirit of Christianity has made her sisters. If that dreadful work of desolation must go on, let the only agent be man; and, if he falls in the battle, deny not to his mother, his wife, or his sister, the holy office of mourning his fall, and bedewing his corpse with her tears.

Mr. Speaker, the same honorable gentleman has complained of the assertion, so often made by us, that this war has produced ruin to our country, and stained with disgrace our national character. He has declared the charge unfounded. The Navy has preserved our drowning honor. The late campaign on the Niagara has covered a multitude of stains. Apart from these, he seemed to admit there had been disgrace; and he declared he would pour the whole torrent of his indignation upon those who had produced it. "But who (he asked) had produced it? Who were the authors of our misfortunes and our disgraces? Those who had declared and directed the war, or those who had opposed the declaration, and at all times remonstrated against its continuance?"

Sir, the question is important; let it be now decided. Who are the guilty authors of the disgrace on our name and all the misfortunes of our country? Are they the men who, before the war was declared, spoke of its dreadful impolicy; portrayed the defenceless condition of the country; pointed daily to the weakness of our means; warned you that your frontiers would be swept by savage desolation, and your cities destroyed; that your States would be exposed to subjugation, your Union to dissolution, and, almost in the agony of despair, invoked you to save your wives, your children, your country, from the sufferings and the evils of the conflict? Or, are they the men, who, forgetting all the sacred duties which bound them to peace; buoyed up by the transitory huzzas of a mob; vain with a little brief authority; hurried along by the fatal influence of party; without necessity, and without mercy, plunged their country, defenceless and naked, into that lake of blood where she is yet swimming? The men who resisted, even unto death, all your weak and wicked schemes of commercial coercion, which spread distress over the land, and conducted directly to this war? Or those who, day after day, and year after year, adopted a course of oppressive and ruinous policy—a succession of weak, yet suicidal measures, from which even war seemed almost a relief?

Who are the guilty authors of your ruin? Those who to the last moment, even on the brink of the bloody gulf, still pointed to the white flag of peace and prosperity, which WASHINGTON had erected? Or those who rudely tore it down, and hoisted the crimson banner in its stead?

Who are the guilty authors of our disgraces? The men, who, when you had plunged into the gulf, still spoke to you of peace—still urged you to grasp the proffered hand of the enemy? Or, those who, having tasted blood, continued to cry for havoc, madly despising the only offer which could issue in a permanent pacification? The men who constantly invoked you to defend your towns and coasts—always protested against your unjust invasion of a neighboring province, and forewarned you that the frowns of a just God would cover with defeat and ignominy all your ambitious schemes of conquest? Or they who, abandoning their own soil and capital to ravage and desolation, in the very spirit of ignorance and gasconade, boasted the conquest of Canada in six weeks, and sent a Hull there, to surrender in thirty days? Who proudly proclaimed that the finger of Heaven pointed to Quebec—that her lofty ramparts were already trembling at their prowess—and sent a Wilkinson to be chased back, covered with the blackest disgrace? Who, for three years, have bent all their power to subjugate a province, poor, thinly populated, badly defended, and in every instance have been overthrown and discomfited? Upon whom, sir, shall the good genius of this country frown!

Review these acts, and tell me who in truth are the authors of this wide-spread ruin—this black disgrace which shrouds the American name?

Let me not be misunderstood. No doubt, our gallant frigates have gilded the national escutcheon with the brightest beams of glory. To the unbending spirit and gallant conduct of the American soldier no man is more sensible. Our armies in the North, during the past Summer, have fought with an heroic bravery worthy the best days of our Revolution. Their gallant leaders are entitled to every meed of applause. But all their resolution, and all their gallantry, but shrouds the Cabinet conductors of the war in tenfold darkness.

How have the bravery and the resolution of our armies been applied? To accomplish the unhallowed schemes of ambition; to carry desolation and death into a country, feeble and pacific, and always the friend of our Republic, until you forced her to become our enemy. And how, even in this work of unjust desolation, how have they been directed? In a manner, weak and foolish beyond example. Look to the Niagara. How has the life of man been made the sport of imbecility and ambition! What hecatombs of human victims have been sacrificed, in an unmeaning contest, for a Canadian fortress, of no use to our country, finally abandoned as worthless.

The fields of Chippewa, of Cornwall, of Bridgewater, and of Erie, are still smoking with human blood, crying to Heaven for vengeance.

O, sir, the authors of this war cannot be guiltless! I tell them, in the final day of retribution, when the rulers of nations shall be summoned to answer at the dread tribunal, the disgrace, the misery, the ruin, and the blood which now covers this land, will lie with the weight of a mountain on their souls.

And what is our guilt? We warned, we conjured you to shun the ruin of this unnecessary, this guilty war. When you despised all our remonstrances, and made the fatal plunge, we still invoked you to turn your thoughts on peace. But when we found all your armies sent on plans of conquest, we appealed to Heaven for our rectitude, and boldly took our stand; conscious that no fate could await our country more dreadful than the guilt of unjust invasion and an alliance with the French usurper. Could we unite in plans which we verily believed had such ends in view? Could we vote for measures to support a war of conquest, which in our souls we loathed, as unjust, dishonest, impolitic? We saw the monstrous tyrant of France standing like a Colossus in the midst of Europe, beating her liberties to the earth, and frowning upon all our free institutions, so hostile in their nature to his despotic soul and his views of universal empire. We saw the final struggle for the independence of mankind about commencing, and its issue involved in dreadful doubt.

Your war, however intended, must be the tyrant's gain. We knew it was better, far better, that all your invasions should be turned back upon you, than that your conquests should add one nerve to that iron arm which was beating down the independence of every nation. We could not aid in your schemes of ambition and conquest. As men, as patriots, as Christians, we could not voluntarily mingle in the unjust conflict.

Yet, sir, for defence we have been always ready; defence which could be separated from your invasion of Canada. This last is your sole property. The wreath of Canadian conquests, whether it be woven of the laurel or the cypress; whether it beam with justice and glory, or be dyed in the black and crimson hues of disgrace and guilt, shall decorate your brows alone. We have not, we never had, we never will have part, or lot, in that matter. But for the defence of our country, even from those dangers with which your madness alone has surrounded her, borne down, persecuted, slandered, as we are by the very Government which should protect us, here we stand, here we have always stood, prepared to furnish every aid, even to the last vital drop which warms our hearts. Such is the very front of our offending. With our opponents we are at the bar of Heaven.

The name of an honorable gentleman, formerly of this House, now a Commissioner at Ghent, has been introduced. A gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. Fisk,) alluding to the charge of the British commissioners, that the conquest of Canada was one object of this war, expressed some indignation at the Massachusetts remonstrance, which they had quoted in proof of their charge. My honorable friend from Massachusetts (Mr. WARD) remarked, in reply, that it was strange the British commissioners had wandered so far for testimony, inasmuch as a simple question to Mr. Clay, if truly answered, would have placed the subject beyond the power of doubt.

The honorable gentleman from Kentucky, after an eulogium upon the character of Mr. Clay, remarked, that although he might have mentioned an invasion of Canada, as a means of compelling the enemy to do us justice, yet he never contemplated a permanent conquest, and an annexation of a British province to the Union. Mr. Speaker, it is strange to me that any doubt exists on this subject. The permanent conquest of Canada has been often avowed within this House, and by gentlemen high in the confidence of the Government. And to me it is wholly unaccountable, that all the American Commissioners have ventured to deny it. The conquest of Canada, it is true, was not set forth in the manifesto, either of the President or of this House. It was not to be expected that an object so shameful would be officially avowed. But you find it avowed in all the gazettes in the confidence of the Government, in the speeches of those members of Congress who declared the war, in the proclamations of those Generals who have conducted the war. And never, to my knowledge, has it been disavowed by the Executive Government, unless the assertion of our Commissioners at Ghent may be deemed such a disavowal.

Sir, I have often heard it asserted on this floor. I have heard it avowed by Mr. Clay while a member of this House. I hold in my hand a speech of that gentleman delivered sometime before the war was declared. I was accidentally in the House; and to show that my friend from Massachusetts (Mr. WARD) was in nowise mistaken, I will read an extract from this speech. "I am not, sir, in favor of cherishing the passion of conquest. But I must be permitted to conclude, by declaring my hope to see, ere long, the new United States (if you will allow me the expression) embracing not only the old thirteen States, but the entire country east of the Mississippi, including East Florida, and some of the territories to the North of us also."

These latter "territories" are none other than the Canadas. Is not this the plain and palpable spirit of conquest? Was my friend from Massachusetts mistaken? At the time, the orator was the champion of the Administration in the Senate. He was transferred to this House, and afterwards, Mr. Speaker, occupied the place in which you have succeeded. It is well known he was the confidential friend of the President. I need not describe his standing in this House, nor state his powerful influence in plunging the country into war. Did he understand the views of the Government? Did he know the objects of the war? It may be now convenient to answer in the negative. Then of course his authority is nothing.

The honorable gentleman has also spoken of union. What are his notions of an useful and honorable union? Not a union of men, but of measures; not of council, but of action. Action! to what end? To save our country? Be it so. But the first step towards that object must be made by those who have dragged the country to the very verge of ruin. Yes, we are ready to act for the salvation of our country. But to what efficient purpose can men act with you, who believe that all your conduct still points to her destruction?

Would you save this country, you must become sensible of her perilous condition, of your own fatal errors. You must learn, that your menaces of conquest have become the mere bravados of rage and mortification; that your frequent party denunciations are the delirious ravings of disappointment and despair; that your hopes of succor from foreign wars are but the lunatic visions of political madness. You must bend all your thoughts on peace; and, until you obtain it, you must apply all your means solely to the defence of the country. Then you will obtain that general union in action which can alone produce any permanent good to the State. How widely different are your designs and your professed ostensible measures! You continue to talk of that miserable policy which has dragged you so heavily through the last three years, and elevated you to the pinnacle of disgrace which you now occupy. You still, in your daily dreams, menace the towers of Quebec, reckless that your cities may meet the same ignoble fate which has swept your Capitol. Party spirit still pollutes all the councils of the Cabinet, and impels it to hunt, with bloodhounds of persecution, the most independent, wise, and virtuous men of the nation. You well know that a course like this presents a wall of brass in the way of a general union. And yet you pursue it with untiring ardor. Where will it finally conduct this devoted country? Is not her fate written in glaring capitals upon the tombstone of every departed Republic?

With such conduct in the ruling power, what is the duty of those in the House, who, like myself, have no confidence in the wisdom of the Administration? I judge for myself alone. The cause is brought home to my conscience. This country must fall, unless every hand is stretched forth to her rescue. I fear there is no hope of safety but in a radical change of rulers. This cannot now be constitutionally effected. We must patiently wait until a whole people, roused from the stupor almost of the grave, shall interpose for our final rescue. In the meantime, the country must be defended.

As a member of this Government, I feel I have no choice remaining. Notwithstanding the continued frenzy of the Administration in relation to conquest, must not this war, in the nature of things and in spite of its authors, be entirely defensive? Where, and in what quarter, have not their errors compelled us to struggle for the very possession of our soil?

In the East, a whole province is torn from us; in the South, we are menaced with the loss of a State. On our Northern frontier, the disciplined hosts of the enemy are marshalled, and, having beaten back invasion, are ready, in their turn, to carry desolation into the bosom of our Union. The forests of the West are again disturbed by the war-shout of the savage. Our Capitol has disgracefully fallen, and all our coasts are open to ravage and conflagration.

When, in this condition of my country, I bow to the Constitution, and, by force of its provisions, am compelled, either to stand neuter, or to trust means of defence to men who may cast them away, or pervert them to conquest, do I therefore participate in their guilt?

But can those means be thus perverted? If even our present rulers are so lost to their country, as to wish to leave her a defenceless victim to the enemy, dare they venture on the suicidal measure? Where are our forces to meet and repel the mighty fleets and armies which threaten invasion? Where are our armies, even for defence?

The very means which must bring them into existence are still slumbering in your committee rooms. What if they should fail? Have we pictured to ourselves the consequence? What man who hears me will survive the bloody spasms, the social distractions, and civil and servile commotions which must ensue a violent termination of our Republic? When I view our own State, the great mart of her wealth, of easy access, and of difficult defence; the great lake extending to her interior, commanded by the enemy; her borders bristling with hostile bayonets, only waiting the Spring to be levelled at our citizens; and when I know the extreme distress, perhaps overthrow that must await her, if unaided in the struggle, my duty forbids me to hesitate. Our States must be defended from invasion; beyond that, is not possible for our means. For, sir, let those mortified and disgraced men, whose rashness and imbecility have combined to produce all our misfortunes, talk as they may, about their vain designs of future invasion and conquest, the wretched state of the Treasury, the melancholy condition of our armies, are no longer susceptible of concealment.

So far is invasion and conquest beyond their power that, in the next campaign, all the resources of the nation, all the spirit of the people, and, I fear, twice the wisdom of the Administration, will be indispensable, to preserve our cities from conflagration, our Union from dissolution, and some of our States from subjugation. In this firm belief, though faint, indeed, are my hopes of success under the influence of present auspices, I hold it as a sacred duty to keep nothing back which may aid in the defence of the country. Every measure applicable to this great object, whether for the supply of money or of men, which shall promise advantage, and which is sanctioned by the spirit of the Constitution, shall have all the aid in my power to furnish, my voice and my vote.

When Mr. GROSVENOR had concluded—

Mr. BARNETT said that the old saying of "one day older and two days worse," was not inapplicable, he thought, to the present state of some gentlemen's irritable faculties; for the nearer we are like to approach to a system calculated to give a manly and vigorous defence to the nation, and security to the blessings we enjoy, in a two-fold proportion do they appear to be dispirited, and doubly loud the denunciations of the cruelty and wickedness of the measure. Mr. B. said he had not been bred to the law, nor to the stage, as had been the lot of some; but that he had served his country as a soldier at sixteen years of age, and he trusted he had done his duty. Mr. B. said he should not, at this time, have troubled the House with any observations of his, but from the notice which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. KING) had taken of some observations of his, made on this floor a few days since; and, said Mr. B., I will now explain to that gentleman more particularly what may be understood by the term "feeding with soft corn." Mr. B. said he had lived in the days of the last Revolutionary struggle, which gave birth to the Government we are now called upon to defend. There were many at that day in the country where he then lived, and now lives, who were opposed, as now, to the measures necessary to defend themselves against the same unrighteous and despotic foe with whom we are now engaged. We remonstrated with them, we temporized, we fed them with soft corn. Their fears, their loyalty, their King, and their consciences prevailed, and, as times became more difficult, they became more mischievous, and the friends of the Revolution more hardened and desperate. Hemp and confiscation were resorted to; but it was the more desperate remedy of Mohock tea that enabled us to plant the tree of liberty in the State of Georgia, and the greater part of South Carolina. Mr. B. said, that in referring to those times, he might be too much led away by early impressions; he was aware of their force, but when his country was bleeding at every pore, torn to pieces by broils and party faction, the similitude was glaring, and who ought not to feel? The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. KING,) in his wild career of affrighted frenzy, has not suffered the Southern slaves, as he terms them, to escape him. He says the Government tried various ways to get soldiers to fill up the ranks of the Army without effect; that they at last offered, as an inducement to the Eastern freemen, the price of a Southern slave. Sir, I can assure that gentleman that I know honest slaves in the South whom I would not exchange for many Eastern freemen that I have seen. Mr. B. said, every feeling of his youth was made alive at the observations of the old patriot, his worthy and honorable friend from Kentucky. (Mr. HOPKINS,) when describing the feelings of an old man, who, in the gallant deeds of his youth, could rejoice in old age that he had defended the cause of freedom, and assisted in handing down to posterity the greatest of all earthly blessings. Mr. B. said the gentleman from Massachusetts never could have had such feelings, or he would not at this important moment have railed against the measures necessary to save the nation.

Mr. B. said he was opposed to striking out the section, as proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. PIERCE.) He was not for depriving the young man of eighteen years of age of the satisfaction he may hereafter enjoy, or the example he may afford, of having defended the only free Government on earth. Mr. B. said some of the best blood of this nation runs in their veins, and that he could not by his vote suffer the over fondness of a mother, the timidity of a father, or the avarice of a master, to restrain them. I am, said he, for breaking their bonds and letting them loose. They will flock to the standard of their country; they will immortalize themselves; they have got vigor and strength too; they will not be found wanting in their country's cause in the day and hour of danger.

Mr. B. asked if it was less important to defend the nation than it was to have given it existence. He answered it was not. He said it was more necessary, it was more dishonorable not to do so. For the people of these United States to have enjoyed the comfort and happiness which they have done, and now to become slaves to that nation to which their fathers, in the infantile state of the nation, bid defiance, would be a two-fold misery, a wretchedness not to be borne. Away, then, with all your party bickering and national pecuniary prejudices; this of wanting to get into power, or that of wanting to keep it, which have alike brought this nation to the precipice of ruin. It is to Congress alone that the people who love their Government look for safety in this hour of danger; the hour when it shall be determined whether vice or virtue shall predominate. Sir, the moment is big with importance; the object is great. When I view the advantages which this country affords above any other, I am led to prospects beyond the grave itself. A Government, where the mind and conscience is left free, will never fail to unfetter itself from the fears and superstitions of the ignorant, and break asunder the manacles that power has rivetted; where, if man is not happy, it is his own fault. But, sir, I fear that while the scars of the Revolutionary soldier are yet to be seen, and also the hoary heads of that day—though thinly scattered among our population—I fear before the fathers are all laid in their tombs, the children will be found rioting in their blood-bought earnings.

Mr. MILLER said, it had not been his intention to trouble the House with any remarks on this bill. After the ability and eloquence displayed by his friends, he certainly should not have risen, had it not been for the observations which had just fallen from the honorable gentlemen from Georgia and Kentucky, (Mr. BARNETT and Mr. SHARP.)

The gentleman from Georgia alludes, with much apparent satisfaction, to the days of the Revolution. He says, and he says truly, that the patriots of that period pursued a course widely different from the war men of the present day. The difference is greater than may have been imagined. The war of the Revolution was a war of the nation; this is considered by a great portion of the country to be the war of a party. That war was commenced for clear and acknowledged practical rights; this, for claims of a doubtful and speculative character. That war was conducted by men of elevated feelings and lofty minds; men who pledged their "lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor," and who gloriously redeemed that pledge. The present war men have not been backward in professions of patriotism and devotion to the cause. They have been profuse in speeches and declarations, but have been a little unfortunate in furnishing the most clear and undoubted evidences of their sincerity. Individual instances of exception throughout this country may be produced; but in general, it may with truth be said, that the advocates of the war, these "life and fortune" gentlemen, have not discovered more alacrity and zeal in the prosecution of the war than their neighbors. In general, they have had a most reverend regard for the safety of their persons, and a laudable respect for the security of their property. They have not been seen in the "imminent deadly breach" more frequently than others; nor have they contributed voluntary aid in money for the prosecution of this, their holy war. On the contrary, many of them have fattened on the distresses of the nation, and amassed enormous fortunes by the war.

Mr. M. said, it could not be pretended that opportunities for the exercise of patriotism had been wanting. The occasion has existed—it now exists. It is admitted on all hands that the nation is in deep distress for money, and yet no rumors have reached us that private fortunes have been poured into the public chest for the relief of the country. In this there is certainly a great difference between the conduct of the present war men and the worthies of the Revolution. Mr. M. called the recollection of the House to the case of that distinguished citizen, who, during the important and decisive campaign of 1781, clothed and fed the American Army out of his own private resources. Congress had no money and very little credit; the Army was starving, and its operations nearly suspended for want of supplies. A patriot* was found who afforded relief by his private credit. And to the reproach of this country, that individual was permitted to die in poverty and want. The conduct of this gentleman affords an illustrious example, well worthy of imitation; but Mr. M. had no expectation that it would be followed by the advocates of the present war. He said the history of the Revolution afforded many other instances of zeal and patriotism, which had not been followed during the present war; and he thought the friends of the gentleman from Georgia would not feel under peculiar obligations to him for drawing the public attention to the comparison. It was a comparison not much to their credit.

The gentleman from Georgia seems to express some dissatisfaction that his friends have not applied "hemp and confiscation," as the proper discipline for the refractory minority. Mr. M. said he would resist such allusions, from whatever quarter they might come. In a Government like this it is not to be endured that such threats should be held in terrorem over the minority. The gentleman's doctrine outstrips the famous doctrine of moral treason, which Mr. M. had hoped was scouted from this House forever. That moral treason system was bad enough in all conscience. By it the minority were compared to the mutineers of a ship, whom the majority had a right to throw overboard at pleasure. Sir, said Mr. M., I deny the right, and I defy the power, of the majority to throw us overboard. We have an interest in the national ship equal to theirs; our right to throw them overboard is equal to their right to throw us overboard; and however gentlemen may think it, I do humbly apprehend that in such a contest our power is not inferior to theirs.

Mr. M. said he could with confidence appeal to his venerable friends around him, and ask them for advice. They remembered the days of the Revolution with a pride and elevation not inferior to that expressed by the gentleman from Georgia. They will tell us not to be deterred from doing our duty by any menaces or threats which may be thrown out here or elsewhere. They will tell us it is our duty to save the Federal ship from the madness and folly of the men now at the helm. They will tell us that it is our duty to "stand on the deck while there is a shot in the locker." Living, they will encourage us by their example; and dying they will exhort us, in the language of our own Lawrence—"Don't give up the ship."

The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. SHARP) has been pleased to designate those who opposed the war, and the measures which have been adopted for carrying it on, as proper objects of detestation. Gentlemen on the other side of the House have not been sparing of their censure for the part we have taken, and they now modestly attribute the present alarming state of the nation to our opposition. Mr. M. said he was willing to admit that the minority had generally opposed the systems and plans which had been adopted. The minority had remonstrated against the course which had been pursued; but the majority had succeeded in everything. They were not to be driven from their course by the clamors of the minority; they have heretofore passed all their

* Mr. Robert Morris, of Philadelphia; of whom Judge Marshall, in his Life of Washington, thus speaks:

"The occasion required that he should bring his private credit in aid of the public resources, and pledge himself personally and exclusively for articles of the most absolute necessity, which could not be otherwise obtained." * * * "To him, in no inconsiderable degree, is it to be attributed, that the very active and decisive operations of the campaign of 1781, were not impeded, perhaps entirely defeated, by a total failure of the means for transporting military stores and feeding the Army." "After having relieved the wants of the moment by his private credit, Mr. Morris proposed to take on himself the task of complying with all the specific requisitions made by Congress on Pennsylvania for the present year, (1781,) on receiving, as a reimbursement, the taxes imposed by a law just enacted. This proposition being accepted, the contract was made; and, in consequence of it, supplies which the Government found itself incapable of furnishing, were raised by an individual."—IV Vol. Life of Washington, pp. 458, 459.

laws; they have not failed of a single measure in this House; they have passed every law they proposed for raising either men or money. What has been the result of all these wise measures? They have brought the nation to the brink of bankruptcy and ruin. The majority are themselves convinced that their measures have been wrong. The best evidence the minority can have, in justification of their opposition, is to be found in the present state of the nation; and the open and undisguised intention manifested by the majority to abandon all their former projects. How can the minority be justly blamed for opposing plans which have nearly ruined the nation? And with what grace do reproaches come from those very men who now openly confess that these plans must be abandoned? The majority who declared the war, and who have failed in prosecuting it, are responsible to this people. They have had all the Constitutional power of the Government; they have disregarded all the warnings of the minority; they have pursued their own course; and it is manifest that they have either not had discernment to select the proper means, or they have shrunk from the responsibility of such measures as were required by the state of the country.

The gentleman from Kentucky thinks the minority treat the Administration with unbecoming freedom. Mr. M. said he did not hold it improper for any member of this House strictly to scrutinize the conduct of Administration. He claimed the right, in its fullest extent, and said that when a fit occasion presented, he should exercise that right. While, with a heart not less susceptible than other gentlemen, he could weep over the wounds of this suffering country; he had a right, and it was his duty, to expose the arm which had inflicted these wounds.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House seem to forget that a difference of action arose very naturally from a difference of opinion. Those who conscientiously believed that the war was necessary and just at its commencement; that nothing had happened to raise a doubt as to the expediency of continuing it; who thought the men in power faithful and competent to conduct the war to a successful issue; those who expected it to result in the honor and happiness of the country, did well to support the war, and it was right in them to afford it all manner of assistance. But he who believed the war to have been inexpedient and unnecessary in its origin; who believed that the principal causes of it had ceased, and that an equitable peace might have been obtained; who believed that the war had been continued from motives of ambition and with a view to conquest; that the prosecution of the war would result in the disgrace of the country and the ruin of our republican institutions; he who believed all this, and yet afforded this war any other aid than what was required of him, as a citizen and subject to the laws, so far from being a patriot, is a villain! Surely gentlemen have not considered the extent of the claim they make upon us; surely they cannot, they do not, think so meanly of us.

Mr. M. said, it had not been his intention to say one word on the merits of the bill, but, being up, he would barely say that he hoped the motion of his honorable friend (Mr. PITTIN) would prevail. Independent of the arguments against the constitutionality of the law, he found sufficient reasons to vote against the clause on the ground of inexpediency. He could not but think that the principle of the bill strikes at the root of civil society, and must be productive of much mischief. It goes to break down parental authority, and takes away all those wholesome checks and restraints which the laws of every well-regulated Government provide for unwary and improvident youth. It cannot be prudent or discreet to take away that protection which our laws have furnished for ardent and inconsiderate boys, who, in a moment of excitement, may be inveigled from the tipping-house to the drum-head.

Mr. M. observed that, in one respect, he differed from his friends who had spoken on this question. They seemed to admit that the permission to enlist minors, without the consent of their friends, would add to the number of recruits. He thought differently. The war projects are already odious in this community, and this plan of enlisting minors would, no doubt, add to the discontents already existing. Parents, masters, and guardians, will not cheerfully submit to have their children, servants, or wards, taken from them without their consent. They will take measures to counteract the law; combinations will be formed to defeat its execution; and you will lose rather than gain recruits by this project. But, said Mr. M., suppose a few additional recruits might be procured by this management; the Administration and its friends can scarcely think it necessary to resort to any measure of doubtful character. Why suffer these lads to be tampered with? why hold out an inducement for your recruiting officers to seduce them from their duty and their friends? Is not this war popular? Are not the people patriotic? And has not the war been successful?

Is not the war popular? After all we have heard on this subject from the President of the United States and the advocates of the war, on this floor and elsewhere, this fact can scarcely be disputed. The advocates of the war, in discussions here, have uniformly told us that the war was popular. They have adduced the elections in support of this opinion, and the majority on this floor is considered as conclusive proof on this point. In all parts of the country the same position has been taken; and it is fortified by the evidence of the war-Governors of the States.

The President has told us, that "the nation felt the necessity of the war, and called for it." In his first Message, after the declaration of war, November 4th, 1812, he consoles himself and his friends for the disgraceful surrender of our army at Detroit, by the "signal proof that the national spirit rises in proportion to the pressure on it." And he said it was necessary to repress rather than excite this patriotic zeal. In his Message at the opening of the last session, December 8, 1813, he says, "we behold a subject for congratulation in the daily testimonies of increasing harmony throughout the nation." Sentiments of the same kind are to be found in other communications from the same source. Now, after all this testimony, it must be conceded that the war is popular. The people also are patriotic—so much so that their "zeal it is necessary rather to limit than excite." Why, then, permit boys to be seduced from their friends?

The war is not only popular, but it has been successful! Mr. M. begged gentlemen not to be incredulous, for he could prove it. To be sure we did not take Canada in the short time which had been predicted. We have heard, too, that our army at Detroit surrendered in the first campaign; that the attempt on Montreal failed in the second campaign; and we do know that this House passed a resolution calling on the President for the "causes of the failure of our arms on the Northern frontier." All of us who have eyes can see, and all of us who have hearts can feel the evidence, the damning evidence, that the enemy did make a "sudden incursion" into this District. The war has nevertheless been successful, and I can prove it from the most undoubted authority. There have been, to be sure, from time to time, some rumors afloat, which, if believed, would seem to bring this fact into question; but they are rumors, mere rumors, utterly unworthy of credit. Look at the public documents; apply to the fountain head, and read the Messages of the President of the United States. On the 25th May, 1813, he expresses his satisfaction at being able to "appeal to the auspicious progress of the war." On the 7th December, 1813, he says: "The best encouragement is derived from the success with which it has pleased the Almighty to bless our arms." On the 20th September, 1814, he appeals "to a series of achievements which have given new lustre to the American arms." And, in his late proclamation for a Fast, November 16, 1814, he calls upon the people of these United States to thank the great Disposer of Events for "the victories which have so powerfully contributed to the defence and protection of our country." The war, then, has been successful! It cannot be doubted! Who dare to doubt it?

Mr. M. concluded by hoping that the motion of his friend from Connecticut would prevail. There was no necessity for altering our militia system. At any rate it could not be necessary to introduce this odious and novel practice, for the war is popular, the people are patriotic, and you have been successful.

The question was now taken on Mr. PITKIN's amendment, and decided in the negative—yeas 65, nays 84, as follows:

A motion was made by Mr. SEYBERT, to amend the said section by striking out the word "surprise."

On which, the House adjourned.

MONDAY, December 5.

Another member, to wit: from Virginia, JAMES BRECKENRIDGE, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill supplemental to the acts authorizing a loan for the several sums of twenty-five millions of dollars and three millions of dollars; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. EPPES also reported a bill making additional appropriations for the service of the year 1814; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the committee to whom was committed the bill from the Senate "to authorize the President of the United States to call upon the several States and Territories thereof for their respective quotas of eighty thousand four hundred and thirty militia, for the defence of the frontiers of the United States against invasion," reported the same with amendments; which were read, and with the bill ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate, "to authorize the purchase of the library of Thomas Jefferson, late President of the United States," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

HORSES LOST IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the resolutions of this House of the 14th and 25th of November last, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of making payment for horses lost or destroyed in the public service; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the whole House on the bill to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, whilst in the military service of the United States.—The report is as follows:

That, from statements made to the committee, the correctness of which they cannot doubt, it appears that at the time the American troops crossed over Lake Erie, just before the battle of the Thames, the mounted volunteers were ordered by the Commanding General to leave their horses at Portage river, on the lake, with a guard and other persons sufficient to take care of them. The horses were put in a large wood, enclosed, for the purpose of keeping them safe; and it was intended and expected that they should live by grazing until the return of the troops. The troops were absent about five weeks, and upon their return the horses were found to be reduced in order, many of them injured, and some dead. It does not satisfactorily appear whether they died for the want of forage or from accident, or the peculiar difficulty and hardship of the service. If their loss is to be ascribed to the former, then the committee have heretofore reported to the House a bill which it is believed will include this case. If the horses died, or were lost or destroyed by accident or labor, then it is conceived that the United States are not liable.

By an act of Congress passed the 2d day of January, 1795, it is enacted, "that, in addition to the monthly pay, there shall be allowed to each officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, and private of the cavalry, for the use of his horse, arms, and accoutrements, and for the risk thereof, except of horses killed in action, forty cents per day; and to each non-commissioned officer, musician, and private, twenty-five cents per day, in lieu of rations and forage, when they shall provide the same."

Mounted volunteers, it is believed, are entitled to and receive the same pay as cavalry. By the above section of the act of Congress, they receive, "for the use of the horse, arms, and accoutrements, and for the risk thereof, except of horses killed in battle, forty cents;" which the committee are of opinion was intended and is a full compensation. They are, therefore, of opinion that for the loss or destruction of horses, except in battle, the United States are not liable. They, however, think that where horses have died while in the public service for want of forage, when it was the duty of the Government to furnish it, the owners ought to be paid their value: and they have accordingly reported a bill to the House for that purpose.

With respect to the horses lost or destroyed by the troops under Major General Jackson, it is stated to the committee that they were lost by accident or surprise, while in the several battles with the Creek Indians. The committee entertain the same opinion of these claims that they do of the others. They therefore recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to authorize payment for the horses aforesaid, otherwise than according to the provisions of a bill already reported to the House for that purpose.

INDEMNITY FOR ROPE-WALKS, &c.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petitions of Jacob Schinnick and Schultz and Vogeler, of Acsah Calef and Christian Chapman; which was read, when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of Jacob Schinnick and Schultz and Vogeler, of Christian Chapman and the legal representative of John Calef, deceased; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.—The report is as follows:

That the petitioners were owners of rope-walks, near Baltimore, which contained a quantity of cordage and raw material, together with the necessary implements for the manufacture of the same; all of which were consumed by fire, on the approach of the enemy on Baltimore, on the 12th of September last, by order of Brigadier General Forman, of the Maryland militia.

The circumstances under which the property was destroyed, as well as the necessity of such destruction, will appear by the following certificates, which the committee offer as part of their report.

CAMP, HAMPSTEAD HILL,

September 19, 1814.

I hereby certify, that in consequence of discretionary power invested in me by Major General Samuel Smith, commanding officer at Baltimore, I ordered the rope-walks near my lines, in the possession of Jacob Shinnick, to be set on fire and consumed on the evening of the 12th instant. The rope-walks at the time contained the tools of the trade, some hemp, and some yarns. I also, at the same time, and under the same circumstances, directed a common frame stable in pasture of Mr. Shinnick to be set on fire and consumed.

T. M. FORMAN,

B. G. Md. Militia.

Two other certificates from the same officer, stating the fact of destruction, under similar circumstances, of the rope-walks of Chapman and Calef, were also before the committee.

BALTIMORE, November 16, 1814.

Although it was decidedly evident that the three rope-walks in front of my lines must be destroyed the moment the enemy appeared before them, yet I did not obtain Major General Smith's permission to burn them until Monday evening, the 12th September. It was then impossible to remove anything, and notice to the owners would have been useless. Indeed, from my knowledge of the demand for wagons and carts to remove the inhabitants after the enemy had landed at North Point, I do not think that teams could have been procured to remove bulky articles.

T. M. FORMAN,

B. G. Md. Militia.

WASHINGTON, November 22, 1814.

I do certify, that the rope-walk owned or occupied by Jacob Shinnick, was situated directly in front of the lines, and under a battery within the command assigned to Brigadier General Forman; that rope-walk and two others were so close to the works, that, had they remained, and an attack been made by the enemy, they would have afforded such a cover as would have enabled him to have approached close to the works undiscovered. It became necessary to destroy them; nor did I give the discretionary power to General Forman until the attack of the enemy appeared certain. Their destruction was postponed as long as prudence permitted, nor were they destroyed until it became absolutely and indispensably necessary.

Late Maj. Gen. comm'g at Baltimore.

The committee are of opinion, from the foregoing facts, that the destruction of the rope-walks was deemed by the commanding officer prudent and necessary, in the defence of the city of Baltimore, then threatened to be invaded by a merciless and vindictive enemy; they are, therefore, of opinion, that the public good, in his opinion, requiring their destruction, the owners of the property should be compensated to the amount of its value, and recommend to the House the following resolution, and report by bill:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners is reasonable, and ought to be granted.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate, "making further provision for filling the ranks of the Army of the United States."

The question depending on Saturday, at the time of adjournment, to strike the word "surprise" out of the amendment proposed by Mr. OAKLEY, was again stated; on which Mr. O. withdrew his said amendment.

A motion was then made by Mr. TAYLOR, to amend the bill by inserting the following section, as the second thereof:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any recruiting officer to pay or deliver to a recruit, under the age of twenty-one years, to be enlisted by virtue of this act, any bounty or clothing, until after the expiration of four days from the time of his enlistment; and it shall be lawful for the said recruit, at any time during the said four days, to reconsider and withdraw his enlistment, and thereupon he shall forthwith be discharged and exonerated from the same.

A motion was made by Mr. FISK, of Vermont, to strike out the word "four," in the said section; and to insert the word "two." And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

On motion of Mr. RICH, the said section was amended.

The question was then taken to agree to the said section, and passed in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 60, as follows:

A motion was made by Mr. WEBSTER, to strike out the fourth section of the said bill.

On motion of Mr. CHAPPELL, the said section was amended. And a motion was made by Mr. OAKLEY, further to amend the said section by striking out these words, "and every recruit thus furnished shall be entitled to the bounty in land, in the same manner and upon the same conditions as the other recruits in the Army of the United States."

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was made by Mr. FISK, of Vermont, further to amend the said section, by inserting, after the word "land," aforesaid, the words "and money." And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

The consideration of them not being required at this time, they lie on the table of course.

REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred a resolution for aiding and protecting the officers of the customs, and for preventing intercourse with the enemy, reported a bill to prohibit intercourse with the enemy, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Saturday next.

Mr. EPPES also communicated the following document.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
November 19, 1814.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, requesting, on behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means, "any information which the Treasury Department can furnish, as to the defects of the present revenue laws, and the best mode of correcting the evils arising from an intercourse with the enemy."

Although the expediency of a general revision of the revenue laws, with the view contemplated by the committee, is acknowledged, I fear it will be impracticable, at this time, to undertake, and to execute, satisfactorily, so extensive a task. The pressure of the current business upon the department is severe, and precludes an application of the Secretary's time to any object which is not of immediate importance. The inconveniences that are suggested in the documents from Vermont, accompanying the reference of the Committee, require, however, an early attention, and the following views of the subject are respectfully submitted to your consideration:

I. The representations from Vermont present various causes of complaint:

1. That smuggling is extensively prosecuted, on the Northern frontier, by citizens of the United States, sometimes with, and sometimes without, the cover of a neutral character; in the course of which the enemy obtains important intelligence; he is furnished with cattle, and other essential supplies; and he is enabled to introduce his merchandise surreptitiously into our markets.

2. That the powers of the revenue officers are inadequate to the detection and prosecution of these offences, because the right of search is not extended to every vehicle that may be employed; because the prohibitory laws do not sufficiently define and enumerate the subjects of an illicit trade; because no efficient act of prevention is authorized to be performed, even upon the strongest ground of suspicion; and because there is no force, civil or military, provided to aid the revenue officers in the execution of their duty, when cases of violent opposition occur.

3. That, limited as the general powers of the revenue officers appear to be, they are rendered still more inadequate by the terror which the officers now feel, of being exposed to suits for damages, under the authority of recent decisions in the courts of law; for it has been adjudged in Vermont, that the inspectors of the customs are not authorized, in any case, to make seizures, and that actions may be maintained against them, to recover the whole value of the property seized, even when the property itself has been duly condemned, as forfeited by law.

II. The actual state of the laws, in relation to these subjects of complaint, may be sufficiently seen in the following analysis:

Of the power and privileges of Inspectors, and other officers of the customs.

1. The inspectors of the customs are persons employed by the collector, with the approbation of the principal officer of the Treasury Department, and their duties are entirely directed to guard against frauds upon the revenue, by smuggling, or any other kind of illicit trade. They are described and considered, throughout the acts of Congress, as officers of the customs, through not as chief officers.

2. On the arrival, or the approach, of ships or vessels, the inspectors, as well as the chief and other officers of the customs, are empowered to go on board, (whether in or out of their respective districts,) for the purpose of demanding manifests of their cargoes, and of examining and searching the ships and vessels. This act is to be performed, ex officio, by way of precaution, without any special deputation from a collector, naval officer, or a surveyor.—4 vol. 367, s. 64.

3. If, however, there be reason to suspect that any goods, subject to duty, are concealed in any ship or vessel, an inspector cannot enter such ship or vessel, to search for, seize, and secure such goods, without being specially appointed for that purpose by the collector, naval officer, or surveyor. And if there be cause to suspect a concealment of such goods, in any particular dwelling house, store, building, or other place, a search warrant must be obtained from a justice of the peace, to authorize a search and seizure. The cases here provided for, are cases of suspicion only, when probable information has been received of a concealment of goods, either on water, or on land, with a design to evade the payment of duties. The act to be performed is not in the ordinary course of an inspector's official duty; it is not an act of precaution, but of detection; it is not an act authorized for seizing goods which are notoriously liable to seizure, but for entering a ship, or a house, in a doubtful case, to ascertain whether any goods liable to seizure are there concealed.—4 vol. 389, s. 68.

4. But any ship, or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise, which are liable to seizure by virtue of any act respecting the revenue, it is the duty of the several officers of the customs (including, by general description, and practical construction, the inspectors of the customs) to seize and secure, as well without, as within their respective districts. The act to be performed, in this case, is founded on the fact, that the property is liable to seizure, but that it is not necessary to enter either a ship or a house, to ascertain whether such goods are so liable, and are there concealed.—4 vol. 390, s. 70.

5. In the performance of their duties, the inspectors, in common with the other officers of the customs, are protected by the law, when unjustly sued or molested, in actions for damages; and when any prosecution is commenced, on account of the seizure of any ship, or goods, in which judgment is given for the claimant, the inspectors are released from all responsibility, on showing that there was a reasonable cause of seizure. [4 vol. 391, s. 71; Ibid 429, s. 89.] This last provision, indeed, has been extended generally for the protection of any collector, or other officer, under any act of Congress authorizing a seizure of any ship or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise, where the seizure has been made on probable cause, although restitution should be decreed.—8 vol. 255, s. 1.

6. The "Act to prohibit any American from proceeding to, or trading with, the enemies of the United States, and for other purposes," declares, that "if any person shall transport, or attempt to transport, over land, or otherwise, in any wagon, cart, sleigh, boat, or otherwise, naval or military stores, arms, or the munitions of war, or any article of provision, from any place of the United States, to Upper or Lower Canada, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick," certain forfeitures and penalties shall be incurred. And authority is given "to the collectors of the several ports of the United States, to seize and stop naval or military stores, arms, or the munitions of war, or any articles of provision, and ship or vessel, wagon, cart, sleigh, boat, or thing, by which any article, prohibited as aforesaid, is shipped or transported, or intended to be shipped or transported." It seems to be a strained and impracticable construction of the provision, to confine the exercise of the authority for stopping and seizing the contraband articles, to the personal agency of the collectors. A collector, in this case, as in every other case where a positive restriction is not imposed, must act through the vigilance and co-operation of the inspectors, and other officers of the customs.

Of the existing auxiliary means to execute the revenue laws, and the laws prohibiting trade and intercourse with the enemy.

1. In addition to the means which the preceding statements will suggest, the Judges of the Supreme Court, and of the several district courts of the United States, and all judges and justices of the courts of the several States, (having authority, by the laws of the United States, to take cognizance of offences against the Constitution and laws thereof,) have the like power to hold to security of the peace, and for good behaviour, in cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, as may, or can be lawfully exercised, by any judge or justice of the peace of the respective States, in cases cognizable before them.—4 vol. 231.

2. Whenever the laws of the United States are opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or the power of a marshal, the President is authorized to call forth a competent force of the militia, to cause the laws to be executed. [4 vol. 188, s. 2, 9.] And by a subsequent act, the President is authorized to employ the land or naval force of the United States, for the same purpose.—8 vol. 311.

3. A final judgment, or decree, in any suit, in the highest court of law or equity of a State, in which a decision of the suit could be had, where is drawn in question the validity of an authority, exercised under the United States, (as in the case of an officer of the customs,) and the decision is against the validity, may be re-examined, and reversed, or affirmed, in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon a writ of error; but the matter in dispute must exceed the value of two thousand dollars, exclusive of costs.—Vol. 1. s. 61, 63.

III. From these views of the subject of complaint, and of the state of the law in relation to them, we are led to consider the best modes of amending the defects, and correcting the evils which exist.

1. An habitual respect for the judicial authority does not permit me to controvert, any further, the decisions of the courts of law in the State of Vermont, respecting the official character and powers of inspectors, and other officers of the customs. It is recommended, therefore, that the law should be so amended, as to place the inspector upon the footing of officers within the meaning of the revenue laws, and laws prohibiting trade and intercourse with the enemy; and that the collectors should be authorized to employ a competent number of inspectors, with authority to stop, search, detain, and seize, all cattle, live stock, and other supplies; all goods and money, and, generally, all other articles whatsoever, howsoever carried and transported, by land or by water, on the way to, or from, the British provinces, subject to such regulations as will secure, with as little embarrassment as possible, the rights of a lawful and neutral trade.

2. The officers of the customs should be entitled, in proper cases, and on proper proofs, to obtain, from any magistrate, a warrant to search dwelling houses, and other buildings; to demand the assistance of the marshal of the district, and his deputies, with the posse of the district, if necessary, for the execution of their duties; and to hold any person to security for his good behaviour, stating, on oath, that they have probable and just cause for believing that such person is carrying on an unlawful trade, or intercourse, with the enemy.

3. No citizen, or person usually residing within the United States, should be allowed to cross the frontier into the British provinces, without a passport from the Secretary of State, or from the Secretary of War, or from the officer commanding the military district in which such person usually resides. All persons coming from the British provinces into the United States, should be required to report themselves, within a reasonable time, to the military commander, or the collector of the district within which they shall, respectively, first arrive. And any person hovering upon the frontier, at a distance from his usual place of residence, without any business requiring his attendance there, and without a passport, should be held to security for his good behaviour, as a person suspected, upon probable cause, to be engaged in an unlawful trade, or intercourse with the enemy.

4. The militia and army of the United States, on the frontier, should be authorized, under proper regulations, to co-operate with the civil magistrates, and officers of the customs, in seizing and securing persons engaged in an unlawful trade, or intercourse with the enemy, together with the articles and vehicles employed in such trade, or intercourse.

5. A more effectual provision should be made for transferring, from the State courts to the Federal courts, suits brought against persons exercising an authority under the United States, so that such suits may be transferred, as soon as conveniently may be, after they are commenced.

6. Treason being defined by the Constitution, and misprision of treason being an offence which is necessarily founded upon that definition, many practices, of a treasonable nature and effect, which cannot be constitutionally classed with treason, are unnoticed in our penal code. An act of Congress declaring such practices to be misdemeanors, and punishing them with fine and imprisonment, would, perhaps, be the most effectual mode of correcting the evils arising from an intercourse with the enemy.

The papers that were received from the committee, are now returned; and I embrace the opportunity to repeat the assurances of the sincere respect, with which I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

LOANS, TREASURY NOTES, &c.

The House, on motion of Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill supplemental to the act authorizing a loan for twenty five millions, and the act lately passed, authorizing a loan of three millions for the service of the current year.

[The first section of the bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to accept Treasury notes to be prepared, signed, and issued, for, and in lieu, of so much of the sum authorized to be borrowed on the credit of the United States, by the twenty-five million and three million loan acts, as has not been borrowed or otherwise employed in the issue of the Treasury notes according to law, provided the whole amount so to be issued shall not exceed $7,500,000, and applied to the same uses as the loans so authorized were intended to be applied.

The second section authorizes the issuing of Treasury notes in like manner for a further sum of three millions, to defray the expenses of the War Department for the remainder of this year, and one million for the Navy Department.

The third, fourth, fifth, and sixth sections provide these Treasury notes shall be in the same form and possess the same qualities as the Treasury notes already authorized, be redeemable in same manner, appropriate money therefor, &c., as well as for the expenses of issuing and distributing said notes and for punishing counterfeiters thereof.]

The bill having been read through—

Mr. EPPES quoted extracts from the letter last received from the Secretary of the Treasury, which is given at length, viz:

WASHINGTON, December 2, 1814.

SIR: Your letter of the 27th of November has been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and I am instructed to ask for the amount of the payments to be made during the present quarter, on account of the public debt; the funds prepared to meet those payments, and any other information which may enable the committee to decide as to the necessity of adopting additional measures for meeting the public engagements during the present quarter of the year.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient,

JOHN W. EPPES.

Hon. Mr. DALLAS, Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 2, 1814.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated this morning, stating that mine of the 27th of November, addressed to the committee on a national bank, has been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

In my communications to the committees of Congress, I have never been disposed to disguise the embarrassments of the Treasury. A frank and full development of existing evils will always, I hope, be best calculated to secure the attention and exertion of the public authorities; and, with legislative aid, I am still confident, that all the difficulties of a deficient revenue, a suspended circulating medium, and a depressed credit, may be speedily and completely overcome. My only apprehension arises from the lapse of time; as a remedy which would be effectual to-day, will, perhaps, only serve to increase the disorder to-morrow.

In answering the inquiries of your letter, permit me to state: 1st. The amount of the payments which were to be made during the whole of the present quarter on account of the public debt, and the funds prepared, or applicable to meet those payments; 2d. The payments that remain to be made, and the funds that remain to meet them, for the residue of the quarter; and, 3d. General information, in relation to additional measures for meeting the public engagements.

First Point.

It is respectfully stated, agreeably to an estimate which was formed on the 4th of October, 1814:

Dr.

|---|--------------------|
| 1. That, during the quarter commencing the 1st of October, 1814, and ending the 1st of January, 1815, including both days, there was payable, for the principal and interest of Treasury notes, during the whole quarter, chiefly at Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, a sum of - - - | $4,457,069 80 |
| 2. That, during the same period, there was payable, for the principal and interest of temporary loans, at Boston, Baltimore, and Charleston, the sum of - - - | 771,125 00 |
| 3. That, during the same period, there was payable, in dividends upon the public funded debt, at the several loan offices, the sum of - - - | 1,900,000 00 |
| | <hr/> 7,128,194 80 |

- | | |
|---|----------------|
| 1. That there were bank credits scattered throughout the United States, on the 1st of October, 1814, amounting, by estimate, to - - - | $2,500,000 00 |
|---|----------------|

H. of R.

Loans, Treasury Notes, &c.

DECEMBER, 1814.

2. That there was receivable from the customs, during the whole quarter, the sum of - - - - -	$1,800,000 00
3. That there was receivable, on account of the sales of public lands, during the same period, a sum of - - - - -	160,000 00
4. That there was receivable, on account of internal duties and direct taxes, during the same period, a sum of about - - - - -	900,000 00
5. That there was receivable, on account of loans, during the same period, a sum of - - - - -	1,700,000 00
6. That there might be obtained, upon an issue of Treasury notes, during the same period, a sum of about - - - - -	2,500,000 00
	9,560,000 00

From which it results:

1. That the amount of the whole payments, for dividends of public debt, for temporary loans, and for Treasury notes, during the whole of the current quarter, was - - - - -	$7,128,194 80
2. That the amount of the whole of the estimated receipts of the Treasury, was - - - - -	9,560,000 00
Leaving a surplus of receipts of - - - - -	2,431,805 20

It is believed that this estimate, which is formed upon official facts and experience, would have been substantially realized in the event, if the banks had not suddenly determined to suspend their payments in specie. But for that occurrence, the dividend on the public debt would have been punctually paid to the individual creditors at Boston on the 1st of October last; the transfer of the public funds, from one place to another place, in order to meet the public engagements, would have continued easy and certain; the credit and use of Treasury notes, (limited to the specified amount,) would, probably, have been preserved, and the revenue arising from duties and taxes would not have been materially intercepted, if at all, in its passage to the Treasury, by payments in Treasury notes.

Second Point.

Dn.

1. That, of the principal and interest of the Treasury notes, payable during the present quarter, and which have already fallen due, there remains, on this day, unpaid, at the places mentioned in the schedule A, the sum of - - - - -	$1,902,680 80
2. That the principal and interest of the Treasury notes, which will become due on or before the 1st of January, 1815, at the places mentioned in the schedule B, amount to - - - - -	1,243,720 00
3. That the dividends on the public debt, payable on the 1st of January, 1815, at the places mentioned in schedule C, amount to the sum of - - - - -	1,873,000 00
4. That the principal and interest of temporary loans, payable during the present quarter, and contracted at the Treasury, in part execution of the authority granted by the act of

Congress passed the 14th of March, 1812, and payable at Boston on the 15th and 31st of December, amount to - - - - -	506,875 00
	$5,526,275 80

Cn.

1. That, on the 28th ultimo, there were bank credits, in the banks specified in the schedule D, applicable to the payment of the public debt, during the present quarter, (deducting the amount of bank credits ($813,000) which, as it could not be transferred for the payment of public debt, has been recently applied to the appropriations for the War and Navy Departments,) amounting to - - - - -	$2,372,287 13
2. That the amount receivable during the remainder of the present year, on account of the loan of six millions, applicable, also, to the payment of the public debt, if no failure in payment occurs, will be about - - - - -	450,000 00
3. That the estimated amount, receivable during the remainder of the present year, on account of customs, applicable, also, to the payment of the public debt, (subject, however, to various contingencies, such as the non-payment of bonds, the payment of bonds in Treasury notes, &c.) may be stated at - - - - -	350,000 00
4. The estimated amount, receivable during the remainder of the present year, on account of the sales of public lands, subject, however, to contingent payment in Treasury notes, may be stated at - - - - -	150,000 00
5. The estimated amount, receivable during the remainder of the present year, for internal duties and direct tax, subject, however, to contingent payment in Treasury notes, may be stated at - - - - -	450,000 00
	3,772,287 13

From this second view of the debit and credit of the account, limited merely to the payment of the public debt becoming due for the residue of the present quarter, it appears—

1. That the debt amounts to the sum of $5,526,275 80
2. That the resources to pay the debt, (excluding the sum applied to the Army and Navy Departments, as before stated, and excluding the possible proceeds of new loans, and new issues of Treasury notes, for the single purpose of paying public debt,) amount to - - - - -	3,772,287 13
	1,753,988 67

The difference between the results of the statements, under the first and the second points, will be accounted for, by the unexpected effect of payments in Treasury notes, on account of duties, taxes, and

DECEMBER, 1814.

Loans, Treasury Notes, &c.

H. OF R.

land; by the total cessation of the use of Treasury notes, either to pay the public creditors or to raise money; and by an unavoidable variance in estimates, depending upon a variance in the state of information at the Treasury. A priority of payment may be justly claimed by the holders of the funded debt; and, therefore, it is proper to add—

1. That the amount of public credits, as estimated in the preceding statement, is the sum of - - - - - $3,772,287 13
2. That the amount of the dividend, on the old and new funded debt, payable on the 1st of January, 1815, is the sum of - - - - - 1,873,000 00
3. And that, consequently, the surplus of the resources, after satisfying that single object, is the sum of - - - 1,899,287 13

It will be observed that these estimates do not include, as an item of the debt, the dividend on the funded debt, amounting to two hundred thousand dollars, which was not actually paid to the individual creditors at Boston on the 1st of October last. But it is omitted, because an adequate fund in the State bank was seasonably provided for the occasion, and the usual Treasury draft was issued in favor of the Commissioner of Loans, so as to deduct a corresponding amount from the bank credits of the Government. The State bank declined, for several reasons, (which it is unnecessary to repeat,) paying in coin, or in bank notes, and most of the public creditors refused to accept the Treasury notes, which the bank offered to them as an alternative payment. It is not considered that, under these circumstances, connected with the general state of the circulating medium, (which places the power of the Government to meet its engagements, on the same footing with the power of the most opulent of its citizens,) there can exist any just reproach upon the public credit, or resources. But, nevertheless, efforts have been anxiously made by this department, and are still in operation, to satisfy the public creditors, independent of the fund which was originally set apart, and which still remains on deposit at the State bank, by all the remaining means at the disposal of the Treasury.

Nor, on the other hand, have I included in the statement of our resources to pay the public debt, the unexecuted authority to borrow upon public loans, and to issue Treasury notes. I have only included the items of revenue, which, in ordinary times, would be deemed certain and effective; reserving any surplus of those items, with the loan and the Treasury notes, to meet the general appropriations for the public service

Third Point.

It is respectfully stated, that the non-payment of the Treasury notes, and the hazard of not being able to pay the dividend on the public debt, according to the respective contracts, was chiefly (I believe entirely) owing to the suspension of specie payments at the banks, and the consequent impracticability of transferring the public funds, from the place in which they were deposited to the place in which they were wanted. I have endeavored, therefore, to induce the banks, as an act of justice, not inconsistent with their interest or their policy, to assist in alleviating the fiscal embarrassments of the Government, which they have thus contributed to produce. The answers to my last proposition (of which a copy is annexed, in schedule E.) have not been received. But the danger of depending upon gratuitous aids (of depending, indeed, upon anything but the wisdom and the vigilance of Congress,) makes, with every day's experience, a deeper impression upon the mind. In speaking, therefore, of additional measures for meeting the public engagements during the present quarter of the year, I derive great satisfaction in reflecting upon the inevitable and immediate effect of the legislative sanction (even so far as it has already been given) to a settled and productive system of taxes, for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the proper credit. This policy, embracing in its course the introduction of a national circulating medium, and the proper facilities for anticipating, collecting, and distributing the public revenue, will at once enliven the public credit; and even the existing resources of the present quarter must ripen and expand under an influence so auspicious. But something may be conveniently and usefully added, for instance—

1. A discretionary authority may be given, by law, to issue Treasury notes for the amount of the sums now authorized to be raised by law.

2. An authority may be given, by law, to transfer bank credits from one place to another place, in order to meet the public engagements, allowing a reasonable rate of exchange.

3. Appropriations may be made, by law, to defray the extra expenses of the War and Navy Departments, during the present year; and a general authority may be given to borrow, or to issue Treasury notes, to supply any deficiencies in former appropriations for those Departments, and for the payment of the public debt, the Treasury notes, and the civil list.

The present opportunity enables me to assure you, sir, that I am preparing, with all possible diligence, to report to the Committee of Ways and Means upon the subjects which they have been pleased to confide to me—

1. The tax bills are numerous, new in some of their principles, and complicated in most of their details; nor are the best sources of information at hand. They will, however, be draughted, and sent to the committee in succession.

2. The plan for establishing a competent sinking fund is under consideration, and will, probably, be ready to be reported before the tax bills are passed.

3. The estimates for the expenses of 1815, the annual appropriation bill, and the bills to authorize a loan, and issue of Treasury notes for that year, are, also, objects of attention.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 25, 1814.

SIR: The sudden determination of most of the banks, in which the deposits of public money were made, to refuse payment of their notes and of drafts upon them, in specie, deprived the Government of the use of its gold and silver, without any act or assent on the part of the Treasury. The equally sudden determination of the banks of each State to refuse credit and circulation to the notes issued in other States, deprived the Government, without its participation, of the only means that were possessed for transferring its funds from the places in which they lay inactive to the places in which they were wanted, for the payment of the dividends on the funded debt, and the discharge of Treasury notes. It was the inevitable result of these transactions, that the bank credits of the Government should be soon exhausted in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, &c., where the principal loan offices for the payment of the public debt were established; and that the Government should be unable to satisfy its engagements in those cities, unless the public creditors would receive drafts on banks in other States, or would subscribe the amount of their claims to a public loan, or would accept a payment in Treasury notes. It was not unreasonable, indeed, to hope that the banks, whose conduct had produced the existing embarrassment, would cheerfully afford some alleviating accommodation to the Government; but every attempt to realize that hope has hitherto failed. Even, however, if the present application should also be unsuccessful, I think I may rely on the intelligence and candor of our fellow-citizens to vindicate the Government from any reproach, for the want of good faith, or of essential resources to maintain the public credit. The events which have occurred the Government could neither avert nor control.

Under these circumstances, I have deemed it a duty to the public, and to myself, to request the attention of the banks, which have acted as agents of the Treasury in the receipt and distribution of public money, to the following propositions:

1. That the banks shall assist the Government with the means of discharging the Treasury notes, and paying the dividends of public debt during the present quarter, at the loan office of their respective States. A great portion, both of the Treasury notes and public debt, belongs to the banks respectively; and, so far, nothing more than a protracted credit will be required.

The balance of the demand will be payable, of course, in the notes of the respective banks.

2. That, to secure and satisfy the advances thus to be made by the banks, respectively, the banks shall be admitted, on reasonable terms, to subscribe to the loan of three millions of dollars; or they shall receive Treasury notes, or they shall receive bank notes, or drafts upon banks in other States. If any bank should prefer accommodating the Treasury with a temporary loan, on a legal interest, this course may be pursued.

I will thank you, sir, for an early answer to this proposition, and, if it should be accepted, I will immediately make the necessary arrangements to carry it into effect.

I have the honor to be, &c.

A. J. DALLAS.

Mr. EPPES then explained the object of this bill, which was to carry into effect the Secretary's recommendations, except that part which relates to the transfer of funds from one quarter to another, which they had determined to postpone until the question relating to a National Bank should have been finally acted on, &c.

The blanks in the bill were then filled, on motion of Mr. EPPES, with seven and a half millions to supply the possible deficiency in the two loans, and with three millions for the deficiency in the provision for the military, and one million for the deficiency in the provision for the naval service for the remainder of the present year.

No debate took place on the principle of the bill. Some discussion and amendment took place on the section for punishing counterfeiters of the bills, in which Messrs. GASTON, WARD, and HOPKINS of Kentucky, took part.

The Committee at length rose and reported the bill; which, the amendments having been concurred in, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

APPROPRIATIONS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on motion of Mr. EPPES, on the bill making further appropriations for the support of the Government during the remainder of the year.

Mr. EPPES read a letter he had received from the Secretary of War, in relation to the deficiency of appropriations in that department; from which it appeared that though it was impossible to ascertain with precision at this time the number of militia in service during the past Summer, there was little doubt but their expenses would greatly exceed the appropriations made for those objects.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, the blanks in this bill were then filled with three millions for the Military department, one million for the Naval department, and other sums for the expenses of Congress, &c.

And the Committee rose and reported the bill; which, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MILITIA DRAUGHTS.

The remainder of this day's sitting was occupied in Committee of the Whole, on the consideration of the bill authorizing the President to call into service 80,430 militia for the defence of the United States.

The first of the amendments reported by the select committee which came under consideration, was that authorizing the President, on failure of the Governors of the several States to comply with the requisition, to call directly on the officers of the militia to cause the draught to be made. This amendment was supported by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, Mr. ROBERTSON, and Mr. TROUP, and opposed by Mr. PEARSON. It was agreed to, ayes 90.

The next amendment goes to change the whole rate of apportionment, so as to fix it on the principle of free population, as ascertained by the last census, instead of the principle of representation, as if it were a direct tax, on which principle the apportionment was fixed in the bill by the Senate.

This amendment was opposed, on opposite grounds, however, by Mr. FISK, of New York, Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. INGERSOLL, and Mr. FORSYTH, and advocated by Messrs. GHOLSON, TROUP, and PEARSON. This amendment was also agreed to. [The quota of the District of Columbia is hereby reduced to 263 instead of 430.] Other amendments were proposed, and further discussion took place.

The Committee rose, without having gone through the bill, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 8.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the State of Pennsylvania, enclosing copies of the returns for members of Congress for the district composed of the counties of Lancaster, Dauphin, and Lebanon, and for the district composed of the counties of Chester and Montgomery, in that State.—Laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of subdividing the quarter sections of the lands of the United States.

Resolved, That the said Committee inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, for the sale of sections heretofore reserved for the future disposition of Congress, and not sold or otherwise disposed of in the State of Ohio, on the same terms and at the same price that other public lands are offered for sale at the respective land offices within the State.

Resolved, That the said Committee inquire into the expediency of attaching to the Canton District, in the State of Ohio, the tract of land extending one mile in width on each side of the rapids of the Miami of Lake Erie, and the Western line of the Connecticut Reserve, which, by a late treaty at Brownstown, in the Michigan Territory, with certain Indian tribes, was ceded to the United States.

An engrossed bill supplementary to the acts authorizing a loan for the several sums of twenty-five millions of dollars and three millions of dollars, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill making additional appropriations for the service of the year 1814, was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "for the relief of John C. Hurlburt, of Chatham, in the State of Connecticut," in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and by amending the act laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors," with amendments; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

MILITIA DRAUGHTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate "to authorize the President of the United States to call upon the several States and Territories thereof for their respective quotas of 80,430 militia, for the defence of the frontiers of the United States."

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, rose and said: He wished to offer an amendment to the bill, which he deemed of the first importance. There existed throughout this country a class of industrious, respectable, and highly meritorious citizens, whose religion forbade them to engage in this trade of war. From the time when the Christian religion was promulged, however strange the fact might appear to those whose business is the destruction of our race, there have always existed thousands who held it a most sacred duty not to imbrue their hands in the blood of their brethren, simply because their rulers had been pleased to declare them enemies. The history of centuries would prove that this was no theory, no speculative vision. It was an article of Christian faith, deemed a command of the Most High; and thousands of these pacific Christians have attested the sincerity of their faith and their practice at the stake and on the scaffold. The bill on the table, Mr. L. said, made no exceptions as to these noiseless, though numerous, Christians. They were subject to be draughted into the ranks of death, there to continue for a year; and if they refused the call, they were subjected to all the rigorous penalties of the law. In most of the States, Mr. L. said, he believed those men were excused from any kind of militia duty whatever, by paying a certain annual tax deemed equivalent to their personal services. He believed, with the exception of Virginia, there was not a State in the Union that did not suffer these peaceful Christians, in some way, to be exempted from military service. The militia laws of Virginia exact the same personal services from them as from others. None are exempted on account of religious faith and conscientious scruples. Their fines and penalties for neglect or refusal are highly severe, and, in general, are rigorously executed.

The courts martial have, it is true, discretionary powers, as relates to fines; but that discretion is generally exercised rather to punish than protect all who cannot join in the ranks. There was a practice, founded on the law of the State, so highly unjust and oppressive in its operation to these peaceful citizens, that he was astonished it should be endured in an enlightened community. When once draughted or called to service, in case of failure to obey, which must always happen to this people, a heavy fine is levied and collected. The delinquent is immediately placed on the next class for another draught, is again, of course, delinquent, and again heavily fined. This call, or draught, is sometimes repeatedly made in quick succession, and fines accumulate to an amount which reduce the most affluent to distress, and those of competent fortune to entire ruin.

H. OF R.

It operates, too, most oppressively upon those of the militia who have no religious scruples as to bearing arms. The number draughted from any particular company is in proportion to the whole number of the company, although it is composed half of men whose consciences forbid military service, and who, of course, never do, and never will, serve; yet the whole number is called forth, and thus, while these Christians are ruined by accumulated penalties, the residue have a most oppressive share of personal service.

Mr. L. said, in the district he represented, this description of their condition had lately, to a great extent, been realized. The fines had accumulated to an amount which the property of those oppressed people could not satisfy. It, of course, must be sacrificed under the marshal's hammer; and, in case of deficiency, their persons committed to prison to expiate the sin of serving their God with perseverance and pure consciences. Mr. L. said, when he viewed the benevolent genius of the constitution of his native State, the liberal spirit of her general laws, and the magnanimous justice which she was in the habit of distributing to her sons, he could not but wonder that this stain on her policy and her justice was suffered to remain. It was in direct hostility to her own spirit, views, and declarations. In 1788, when ratifying the Constitution of the United States, her convention tendered a bill of rights to the Union; and this was the 19th article of that bill: "That any person religiously scrupulous of bearing arms ought to be exempted, upon payment of an equivalent, and another employed 'in his stead.'" Mr. L. said, he cited from memory, but was sure that he was substantially correct. How different from this is the present practice? The present law is most unequal in its operation; the mass of the militia, having no religious restraints, could perform their duty in person, or, at worst, by hiring a substitute; and a tour of duty, performed in either way, exonerated them from further calls, until every militiaman, of every class, had, in his turn, gone through the same process. These peaceful Christians could not, as they believed, under the penalties of eternal perdition, enter your ranks in arms, and they are not casuists enough to believe that they may innocently do that by substitute, which the Prince of Peace has forbidden them to perform in person. They cannot, therefore, deliver themselves from the constant harassing of marshals, and fines and imprisonment. In every class they are bound to take a chance for draught, and, if unsuccessful in every class and upon every draught, they are subjected to a round of suffering and oppression. He said it might be objected, that his amendment would interfere with State militia laws and regulations. He denied it; or, if it should, so did all the provisions of the bill. The bill contained principles in open violation of the State rights; it went not through the State executive, but directly to the ranks of the militia upon a certain contingency. It made direct requisitions upon those ranks, and annexed penalties and punishment to neglect or refusal to obey those requisitions. It was against this assumption of power he wished to protect these people. He said, if gentlemen would look at the bill, they would find that a power was assumed, from which no State exemption could deliver the citizen; you impose fines and penalties in a manner which the States alone have the Constitutional power to do. You make a call upon the militia, and you doom those who do not obey your call, without discrimination, to fine, imprisonment, and probable ruin. In this way you approach directly a class of citizens who you know would suffer crucifixion sooner than obey your requisition, and you leave them no refuge but in your penalties and punishments. Why is this done? Not to fill your ranks! For you know these men will never be in your ranks, unless by ruffian force. It is to wring from them the little property which, by frugality, sobriety, and labor, they have collected to sustain their families, and smooth the pillow of old age. He said it was unjust, oppressive, and sinful. Mr. L. said, he did not mean to ask for those people any peculiar boon beyond what the true principles of toleration demanded. Of all the pecuniary burdens of the State, the property of those men must bear its share. He did not ask an exemption from the general weight and burdens of the State—there ought to be, there could be, no such exemption. But, as to personal service in arms, if any man conscientiously believed it was forbidden by the voice of God, no human tribunal had the right to force such a man to violate his religion and his conscience, and to stain his hands with human blood. A fair equivalent was all that any Government had the right to require from such a man, to be applied, not particularly to the work of war, but to the general purposes of Government; with this all ought to be satisfied. The equivalent ought not to be oppressive on the one hand, nor on the other ought it to be so reduced as to permit any but the really conscientious to take advantage of it for improper purposes. Mr. L. then offered the following section to the bill, which was adopted by a large majority:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That every person who is a member of any religious sect or denomination of Christians, conscientiously scrupulous of bearing arms, shall be exempted from the performance of the duties required by this act, by paying his due proportion of the amount contracted to be paid by the class in which he is included, according to the provision of the fourth section of the act; or, in case there shall be a draught in such class, by paying to the person draughted such sum as shall be ascertained by the commanding officer of the company, so that the sum shall not exceed three months' pay; and the payment of such sum of money, in either case, shall be considered as entitling such person to an exemption from all the duties required by this act.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, the bill was amended so as to reduce the term of service of the militia proposed to be draughted, from two years to one year. The majority in favor of this motion was about twenty votes.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, observed that he thought the bill objectionable in principle; and with a view to try the sense of the Committee, he moved to strike out the first section of the bill. He begged the indulgence of the Committee, while he submitted some remarks in support of his motion.

Mr. Chairman, you have been correctly told by the honorable chairman of the Military Committee (Mr. TROUP) that, in discussing this bill, it will be proper to settle the principle, on which you intend to rely, for assisting your military force, to carry on the war. With this object in view, it will be necessary to compare the provisions of this bill with the other military plans now on your table.

The honorable chairman (Mr. TROUP) has pursued that course; and without entering at large into a discussion of the question, has objected to this bill, because he considers it too inefficient in its provisions; and because the kind of force (militia) is not of that character required by the present situation of the country. He says "it cannot be true that this Government, charged with the general defence, authorized to declare war, and raise armies, can have but one mode of raising armies, whilst every other Government that has ever existed has had an absolute power over the population of the country for this purpose, and has actually exercised it. But this question is not properly before the House, and (he says) I will not go into an argument to show that you can, like other Governments, resort to other modes of raising armies than that of voluntary enlistment. That you can resort to classification and draught, to classification and penalty, or any other mode which a sound discretion may in a particular state of the country dictate and justify. All I intend to say at present is, that you have an absolute power over the population of the country for this purpose, and that, in the present state of the country, it is wiser to resort to classification and draught, than to resort to this bill from the Senate." These are the positions taken by the honorable chairman of the Military Committee, (Mr. TROUP.)

I object, sir, to the whole system of force and coercion; and contend that under this Constitution you have no right to raise armies except by voluntary enlistment; and further, that if you had the right it would not be discreet to exercise it.

The plan which gentlemen wish adopted is conscription! They call it classification and penalty—classification and draught. Sir, there is poison in the dish; garnish it as you please, there is poison still. You call it classification! I stickle not for names—"a rose by any other name would smell as sweet." Is this classification? "Disguise thyself as thou wilt, slavery, still thou art a bitter draught." The times demand that things should be called by their right names—this is conscription, and with features, more hideous, than are to be found in the exploded system of our unfortunate cousin of Elba.

This system of conscription, I contemplate with a horror which I cannot express, and with an alarm, which it would be criminal to conceal. Other gentlemen think differently, and will of course act differently—he who views it as I do, but illy performs his duty to his conscience or his country, if he neglects to remonstrate against it, with a zeal proportioned to the enormity of the principle, and the extent of the evils involved in it.

For one, I cannot consent to be a mere spectator of a scene like this. I should consider myself as utterly unworthy the confidence of my constituents, if I did not oppose this high-handed attempt upon their rights and privileges. I would not dare to meet the indignant frowns which I should deservedly receive from them, if I did not oppose this system to the utmost of my power—I should consider that I insulted the ashes of my forefathers, who, during the struggle of the Revolution, in their humble station (and humble indeed it was) performed some little service to the State. I should be unjust to my own claims to personal freedom; I should be an unfaithful guardian to the interests of my children, if I did not oppose this system in all its forms and in all its aspects. The finger of scorn shall never be pointed to a son of mine, and say, that man's father, placed by the partiality of his friends in the councils of the nation, omitted to oppose this system by every means in his power. I seize this occasion to put myself upon the record, in characters too legible to be misunderstood. If the liberties of this country are now to be sacrificed, I wash my hands of any share of the crime. I may indeed be offered upon the altar of conscription, but if my voice and my strength do not fail me, I will this day make you my witnesses to prove that I was not a willing victim.

What are the plans by which you intend to fill your army? I object to them all, as unconstitutional and inexpedient; they all look to force, and you have no right to raise an army except by voluntary enlistment. I have indeed heard that these were rival plans; for myself I consider them all as parts of a system of tyranny and oppression—they are all branches of this Bohn Upas which is to overshadow this country, and poison all the comforts of this people. If either bill passes, the principle of coercion is established; and the claim to "absolute power over the population of the country" will soon be asserted.

Your present military plans are all unconstitutional. In order to arrive at a just conclusion, as to the extent of your powers, it will be well to remember the structure of our Government, and the objects of its formation. This Constitution was formed by separate, free, and independent States, who mutually agreed to give up some of their rights of sovereignty for a common object. The States were jealous of their rights, and, with much care and circumspection, limited their grant to the General Government, for the objects defined. It was not a leading motive with the States to make this a great military nation. The objects are disclosed in the preamble to the Constitution, viz: "To form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." These were the inducements which procured the adoption of this Constitution.

DECEMBER, 1814.

Militia Draughts.

H. OF R.

You are now unfortunately at war, and you wish to fill the ranks of your army. The bill before us discloses one of your plans; it seeks to raise eighty thousand men from the militia "by contract or draught." This bill, I am free to admit, is less objectionable than either of the other projects; but it is nevertheless unconstitutional. Congress have no power to "raise militia." You have only a right to provide for calling them out in the three cases mentioned in the Constitution. The title of the bill would seem to imply, that "the defence of the frontiers" was its object, but there is no provision in it which limits the service of the militia to defence, or to either of the cases enumerated in the Constitution. Indeed, gentlemen have avowed the intention to carry on the war by means of these militia. Sir, the Constitution gives you no such right. The militia may be used by the General Government in the emergencies stated, but the exigency must exist, or the right to call them out does not exist. A power to use the militia to carry on a war is not granted by the Constitution. You can employ them to "repel invasion," but not to carry on the war. By this bill you may take the militia to Quebec or to Halifax; and the same usurpation which permits you to push them beyond the St. Lawrence, will justify you also in pushing them to the Shannon or the Thames.

There is another argument which bears upon this question. Militia officers are appointed under the State authorities; these State authorities vibrate with parties. To day you have one description of officers, who are called out to carry on the war—to-morrow there is a change in the State government, the officers on duty are removed, and others are appointed. The inconvenience which would flow from such a state of things goes far to prove that you have no power to carry on a war by militia.

There is another feature of this bill which deserves some notice. You have introduced an amendment by which, in case the Governors refuse to comply with the requisition, the President may issue his order to other military officers of the States. The effect of this amendment will be, to encourage mutiny and insubordination in the militia; and thus, like all your other measures, tend to weaken the security of the States.

Connected with this system, is a bill we passed a day or two since, authorizing the enlistment of minors, without the consent of parents, masters, or guardians. This has been considered unconstitutional, and I think there can be no doubt that it is inexpedient. It subverts all order, it goes to the destruction of civil society. Under that law, you need not be surprised to see some philosophical recruiting sergeant, marching through your towns and villages, with this inscription on his standard: "If any children have undutiful parents, or if any servants have disobedient masters, let them come here and enlist."

But this project, bad as it is, is not by any means so objectionable as either the system contemplated by the bill from the Military Committee of this House, or that recommended by the Secretary at War in his letter of the 17th of October, 1814. The bill from the Military Committee proposes to divide the whole free male population of the country (without any exception) into classes of twenty-five; each class to furnish a recruit to serve during the war; and in case any class shall make default in furnishing the recruit, a direct tax is to be laid on the property within the territorial districts comprising the class. This is what has been called classification and penalty. The project of the Secretary of War is:—"Let the free male population of the United States between eighteen and forty-five years, be formed into classes of one hundred each, and let each class furnish four men for the war, within thirty days after the classification, and replace them in the event of casualty." From this system, there are to be no exemptions, except the President of the United States, and the Governors of the States and Territories. This is called classification and draught; but is in fact, a system of military conscription more extensive than was ever before attempted by the ambition of tyrants.

Mr. Chairman: This plan violates the Constitution of your country; it invades the rights of the State governments; it is a direct infringement of their sovereignty; it concentrates all power in the General Government, and deprives the States of their "necessary security." It does away all claim to personal freedom; it is a daring attempt upon the rights and liberties of this people.

This conscription is unconstitutional. The Government of the United States is a Government of limited powers. You take by grant; your powers are special and delegated—they must be construed strictly. "All powers not delegated, are reserved to the States or the people." Your authority is defined—you take nothing by inference or application, except what may be "necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the powers expressly granted.

What then are the legitimate powers of this Government over the military force of the country? There are two kinds of military force mentioned in the Constitution, armies and militia, and your authority over each is set down with accuracy and precision. Congress have power to declare war, and with it the necessary power "to raise and support armies," and to "make rules for their government and regulation." Armies then are the forces of the United States, with which they are to carry on their wars; and are subject to their exclusive jurisdiction and control. But the militia are the State troops, which Congress have no power to raise. They are a force existing, known and acknowledged at the time of the adoption of this Constitution; existing without the aid or concurrence of the General Government. The general power over the militia resides in the States; a particular authority, for objects defined, was carved out of that general power, and granted to the United States. The militia are the security of the States against foreign or domestic foes. The States were not a little jealous of this right, and to prevent any encroachment upon it, they procured an "amendment" to the Constitution in these words: 2d. Amendment: "A well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed." Thus this "necessary security" is not only recognised but guarded and protected. Congress has no power to raise militia, to appoint their officers, or to train them. The general power is in the States; out of this general power there is delegated to the United States a particular authority, in certain specified cases, and this authority is "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion." And with a view to give uniformity to their manoeuvres, and make them more efficient, when their services should be required by the exigencies enumerated, it is permitted Congress to provide "for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia; and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States."

Now, waiving all arguments against this plan, which may be derived from the genius of our Government, and the freedom of our institutions, I ask, whether under the naked power to "raise armies" you can adopt a plan which goes to alter the whole military system of the United States, and to destroy the militia of the States, thereby depriving them of their "necessary security?" The Secretary seems to be aware of this objection, and has labored to obviate it. He admits (let it be remembered) that it would be a violation of the Constitution to draw men from the militia service into the regular army: but, he says, by his plan "the men are not drawn from the militia, but from the population of the country." With all due deference and humility, this is a pitiful sophism. The militia of many of the States are now out on duty, and, if his plan is adopted, you will literally draw men from the "militia service." But it is not material whether the militia are on duty or not; you have no right to force a man from the militia into the regular army. If he offers voluntarily, you may take him, but you cannot compel him by force. You say you do not take him from the militia, but from the population of the country. Now I should like to know, whether the military population of the country is not the militia of the States? If it is, then you have no right to force one of them into your service; and yet you claim a right to force them all. The classes are to replace the men who are lost by casualty, and the case may happen, that each individual of a particular class may thus be compelled to render personal service. I can see no escape from this argument. If you have a right to force one man from a particular class, you have a right to force all the men from that class; and if you have a right to force all the men of one class, you have a right to force all men of all the classes. The power to raise armies under this Constitution, can never be construed to extend to a plan which goes to alter the whole military system of the United States, and take from the States that "necessary security" so explicitly acknowledged and guaranteed.

I now proceed to examine some of the other positions which the Secretary takes in support of his conscription. Congress have power to raise armies, and he says, "an unqualified grant of power gives the means necessary to carry it into effect." This is a position which I do not mean to controvert: but, I do say that the grant of power "to raise armies" is not an unqualified grant. It is qualified by the spirit of our Constitution; it should be exercised in the spirit of freedom, and in the manner usually and ordinarily pursued by free States: not by means arbitrary, vexatious, unusual, and oppressive. Besides, this "power to raise armies" is qualified by that authority and claim on the militia which was known and acknowledged to reside in the States; you have no right to raise armies in a way which must necessarily defeat all the security which the States have under the Constitution.

The Secretary says, "the militia service affords a conclusive proof and striking example" in support of the right which he claims for Congress, to raise armies by conscription. This I must deny—the cases are not parallel. The militia belong to the State governments, whose powers are more extensive than those of the General Government. Your powers are limited, and must be construed strictly. With respect to State governments, a different construction has obtained—the residuum of power is with the States or the people; and, in regard to State Legislatures, the general rule is, that all powers are granted, except those which are expressly denied. Indeed, so obvious and undoubted is this opinion, that respectable authority is not wanting to prove that as to State Legislatures, a power to legislate, in a case not forbidden, is not to be taken away by inference or implication. The example of the militia under the State laws is not to be drawn into precedent, to establish a right in the United States to raise armies by conscription. You have no such right; it violates the first principles of the Constitution.

There is another objection to the bill proposed by your Military Committee. By the Constitution direct taxes are to be apportioned among the several States according to representation, and this rule is palpably violated by this bill. The fourth section contains the principle which I contest. It provides that the class which fails to furnish a recruit shall forfeit four hundred dollars, to be collected on the property of every taxable person within the territorial division of such class. Sir, this is a direct tax not apportioned according to representation, and therefore unconstitutional. The slaveholding States have an unreasonable and an unjust advantage. Each one of their slaves, as to all purposes of political consequence, is three-fifths of a man; but, by this bill, he dwindles to nothing in the apportionment of the burdens of the war. The slaveholding States furnish less, and the other States more than their fair proportion of men, provided the classes furnish the men. Suppose the men are not furnished, then the slaveholding States pay a direct tax in no way proportioned to their representation.

Take as examples the States of Massachusetts and Virginia. The inequality is apparent. Massachusetts has twenty Representatives, and Virginia twenty-three. The free male population of Massachusetts, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years amounts to 120,270, and that of Virginia to 93,750. Massachusetts will have 4,810 classes of twenty-five each, and Virginia 3,750 classes. If, then, each class provides a recruit, Massachusetts will furnish 1,060 recruits more than Virginia, whereas Virginia ought to furnish more men than Massachusetts in the proportion of twenty-three to twenty, the number of their Representatives. But suppose each State pays the penalty, then Massachusetts will pay $331,400 more, and Virginia the same sum $331,400 less than the Constitution requires; and Massachusetts will pay $424,000 more than Virginia, whereas Virginia ought, by the Constitution, to pay $238,890 more than Massachusetts. The apportionment is unconstitutional.

Your conscription system, in any view of it, ought not to be adopted. The Secretary of War admits that the abuse of power in raising armies is to be dreaded; and he says, too, that "our Constitution has provided ample security against that evil." It has, sir; and if so, it forbids conscription. If the General Government has that "absolute power" which is contended for, I can see no security against the exercise of it. If to-day you can raise men by conscription, to-morrow some military despot may embody anticipated conscripts as the ministers of his vengeance. The guard which our Constitution has placed against the abuse of power in raising armies is this: you must raise them by voluntary enlistment. If you have a right to force the people of this country into your armies, then they have no right left worth preserving. Life and all its comforts are robbed of half their value.

The effect of this conscription will be to alter the whole character and genius of your people. Instead of pursuing the arts of peace you must become a military nation. This system will break up all our habits and all our pursuits. It is a daring violation of the rights of this people. It has been our boast that we lived in a land of freedom. How often have we proudly claimed pre-eminence in the rank of nations—a pre-eminence founded on the free spirit of our institutions? How often have the citizens of this Government fondly contrasted their situation with that of most European countries? We have said that while the wretched subjects of other Governments were compelled to fight the battles of their masters, we could pursue in quiet and in peace those arts and those avocations which best suited our taste and convenience. If this conscription system is adopted, farewell to all our claims to personal freedom—farewell to all our boast of civil liberty. By this system, the people of these United States will be instantly and forcibly transformed into soldiers; the ordinary pursuits of life must be abandoned for the peril and vexations of a camp; our peaceful occupations must be forsaken; the merchant must quit his counting-house; the farmer his plough; the mechanic his workshop; the professional man his pursuits—all, all must become soldiers! Our sons and our brothers, those who are to be the "future men" of this country, instead of laying the foundation for future usefulness, must be subjected to the moral and physical evils of a camp. All the habits of domestic life must be annihilated, and all its endearments outraged or disregarded. The husband must be torn from his wife and his children, and the child forcibly separated from the society and protection of his parents. I beseech gentlemen to pause before they venture upon a system like this.

The example of Rome has been quoted to justify a conscription. No argument can be drawn from ancient Rome in favor of this project. We live in another age, and in another country. Our people are different; the objects of our Government are entirely different. Our Government was formed by patriots, in peaceable times, and for peaceable objects. Rome was founded by a military chieftain, at the head of a daring and profligate band of freebooters—it was founded on fraud and on violence, on rapine and on rape. Romulus was not only an adventurous military leader; he was, also, a consummate legislator. He shaped his Government to suit the people he governed, and with a view to the situation of the surrounding nations. His object was to make a military Government. The Roman Government, in some of its features, was a Republic, but in regard to its military institutions it was despotic in the extreme. Let us be warned by her example. She could raise great armies, but those armies destroyed her liberty. She did, indeed, extend her conquests, but it ought not to be forgotten that Rome fell by her own weight.

Rome herself, arbitrary and despotic as was her military system, affords an example not more detestable than the one now recommended;—there were many exempts under her laws. Those who held offices, whether civil or sacred; those who had rendered important services to their country, including men of extraordinary merit, with many others, were exempted from military service. But our system is to include everybody. Besides, in Rome, military duty was considered a personal service, and none were called upon to perform it except those who possessed the necessary personal qualifications. So well settled was this principle, that draughts were not usually resorted to; the ordinary mode was for the Tribunes to select; and this selection was determined by the personal qualities and appearance of the soldier. But your system, like no other military system, except the French Conscription, disregards the personal disability of the recruit, and includes the lame, the halt, the diseased, and blind; all are swallowed up in the devouring vortex of your proposed conscription. The leading example of conscription is found in modern France. The future historian of this country will no doubt consider it not a little remarkable, that an American Congress was called to debate a project of conscription at the very instant that the crowned heads of Europe had, by unanimous consent, abandoned it as the most detestable remnant of despotism and usurpation. Sir, the iron system of Bonaparte was not so intolerable as yours. He included only those between twenty and twenty-five years; you propose to take all from eighteen to forty-five. By his plan the young men were called upon; those of twenty years first, and others were not demanded unless there was a deficiency; your merciful conscription will make all from eighteen to forty-five equally liable. Besides, the despotic power of Bonaparte enabled him to make discriminations in cases of peculiar hardship, and he did discriminate. But pass your law, and where is the power which can dispense with its provisions?

France has been a military nation; the idea of war and its dangers had become familiar to the young men of that country, and they prepared for it; here all our people are taken unprepared, and the total ruin of families must be the consequence. In France, the liability extended only to those from twenty to twenty-five years of age; here, all are included, from eighteen to forty-five, and all business arrangements must be interrupted or suspended for that period. In France, a call for anticipated conscripts was not unusual. It is long since they were anticipated for four years; the same thing may happen here. If the recruit furnished by the class is killed, dies, deserts, or his place becomes vacant by any casualty, it must be made good. I have authority for saying that in France the ninety-sixth man has been drawn from a class of one hundred; the same may happen here. I entreat you to try this ground well before you attempt to tread it. The same evils, the same desolation, and the same anguish which have followed this system in another country, must and will follow it here. It will be more severely felt by this people than by France. France was a military nation, accustomed to despotic power. We are a peaceful people, cradled in a land of liberty. "The apprehension of the good gives but a keener relish to the worse."

Faber, in his "Sketches of the internal state of France," has marked the operation of this system of conscription in that devoted country. If we adopt this system, so sure as the effect follows the cause, so sure shall we witness the deplorable consequences which there flowed from it. Hear the evidence of an eye-witness, and be warned by the example. I beg your attention while I read a few extracts. He says:

"The law admits of no exception or modification. It reaches even those who are recognised by the proper tribunals as unfit for service in consequence of physical infirmity. They are compelled to pay a fine, proportioned to the whole amount of the taxes, levied either upon them or their parents. No recruiting system ever before presented such a feature as this. Personal service has been everywhere considered as the sole object of such systems. The idea of exacting a pecuniary compensation from those who labor under a physical disability to serve, was never before entertained."

"No condition of life; no circumstances of position, however peculiar, give title to exemption. I have seen a conscript, the son of a blind mother, whom he supported by his labor, forced to march. I have known a hard-working mechanic, robbed of three sons, in three consecutive years, whom he had laboriously instructed in his trade, and upon whose assistance he relied for the support of his old age."

"The day fixed for the drawing of lots for the conscription, is one of public mourning and of anguish for every private family. Parents, both mothers and fathers, accompany their children to this horrid lottery, and display in their countenances, and by their accents, the most violent emotions of grief and despair. A gloomy silence prevails until the drawing commences, when the decisions of chance lead to demonstrations, either of joy or of sorrow, which equally shock or overpower the feelings of a spectator."

"The Prefect, the sub-Prefect, and the Mayors, preside on the occasion, and frequently see their own children among the number of the conscripts. I have remarked a Mayor, when his child approached to seek his destiny in the fatal urn; the faltering voice of the father, and the tears that rushed to his eye, showed how nature worked, in spite of the sense of imperious necessity which accompanies this transaction. I have noted the swellings of his heart, and the invincible oppression of his spirits when he undertook, as is enjoined upon him by law, to pronounce a discourse of encouragement and exhortation to the new soldier. When he expatiated on the beneficence of the Emperor, and gave the signal of 'Vive Bonaparte!' at the end of his speech."

"After the conscript sets out there is but little hope of his return. The term of service is limited only by the duration of hostilities. When the parent, therefore, takes into consideration the character of his Government, the evils, both moral and physical, to which his child is exposed in the armies, and the havoc of lives made in them, he must regard a summons to the conscription as a visitation upon the latter worse for all parties than that of death."

I appeal to honorable gentlemen who are parents, and entreat them not to adopt a system which deprives them of their children forever. Compared with conscription, death itself is mercy. I beg gentlemen to believe that I feel what I say. I have followed four children to the tomb. Under present circumstances ought I to repine their loss? When I see the attempt to fasten this conscription upon us, ought I to regret that they have gone to Heaven? My daughters, had they lived, might have been the mothers of conscripts; my sons might have been conscripts themselves. I have yet, (I am grateful for it,) I have yet, two lovely boys—lovely indeed, though they are, and inexpressibly dear to me, rather than see them the subjects of this conscription, I would, with resignation, follow them also to the tomb of their fathers. Gentlemen may say that my whole head is weak; I confess to them, that on this subject my whole heart is faint.

There is another consideration well worthy of notice. Already the war is carried on with much disadvantage on our part. The character of the enemy's troops—and the kind of force which we oppose to them—shows the contest to be much in his favor. The enemy brings against us the sweepings of Europe; good soldiers, no doubt, but good for nothing else. We oppose to them the bone and sinew of the country; our honest, respectable and industrious citizens, many of them with large families, are put into this contest of blood, against men without character, without occupation, and without homes. Your conscription system will add much to this disparity. There are certain evils of war which you can remedy. Your commerce may revive; your agriculture and your manufactures may be restored; the public edifices now in view may be refitted. You may rebuild a city that is sacked. Time and money may replace all these. But there are evils which you have no power to remedy. You cannot fill up the space which will be made at many a happy fireside—you cannot restore the husband to his wife and his family—you cannot bring back the son to the arms of his parents—you cannot rouse the sleeping warrior from his tomb—you have no cure for a wounded spirit—you cannot mend a broken heart! These are awful facts; I beg gentlemen to consider them.

This conscription is not only utterly incorrect and inadmissible in principle, but it will prove arbitrary, hard, and oppressive in practice. It will impose an intolerable burden on the poorer classes of society. Each class is to furnish a man; and the man may be designated by lot: in this way the poorest citizen runs an equal hazard with the most wealthy man in the community. If the rich man is drawn, he has the means and may perhaps hire a substitute, while the poor man must perform the service himself—he must quit his business and family, and leave them dependent for a precarious subsistence on the bounty of their neighbors and friends.

This system is the more intolerable, from the consideration that the recruit is to be placed under an officer of the United States. If he is called out as a militiaman, he goes for a definite object, with his own officers, and in the society of his friends and neighbors. Not so under this conscription; no one can calculate on what service he is to be employed; under what command he is to serve; or with whom he is to associate. I have no disposition to lessen the respectability of the regular Army; but I cannot look to the practical effects of this system, without remembering that armies are not usually composed of the most estimable portion of the population of a country. Much less can I forget that the Governor of New York, (who has lent himself to the Administration as the pioneer of conscription) did pardon a horse thief, on condition that he should enlist, and serve in the Army of the United States: a condition not left to doubt or uncertainty; I have seen it patent on the pardon. That Governor Tompkins is the friend of the war, I well believe; for, just before his last election, he descended from his elevated station, as Governor of New York, and acted as a sort of deputy paymaster, for your great men in this Administration. He is said also to be a friend to the Army. But it was an insult to the ranks of your Army to say this horse thief was a fit associate for your soldiers. What greater discouragement could be given to the recruiting service than this act of the Governor, which so expressly declares, that he considers the punishment of enlistment a sufficient commutation for the punishment due to the crimes of a convicted felon?

I must and will oppose this project, so humiliating, so oppressive, and so unjust. I tell you, sir, that my constituents are too respectable, and too valuable, for a service of this sort; and with my consent they never shall be compelled to associate on equal terms with Governor Tompkins' pardoned horse thief. If they choose to enlist, it is an affair of their own; but you shall not have my vote to coerce them. No, sir, this system should be adopted by none but tyrants, it should be submitted to by none but slaves. If you succeed, in common with others, my constituents will be forced into your Army. In spite of their reluctance to military life—in spite of their objections to this war of conquest and ambition—in spite of their families, and all the tender ties which bind them to their firesides, they must be "delivered over" to the recruiting officer, and dragged to a military rendezvous. They must go. If they refuse, they will be compelled by the same cruel and oppressive means which the French conscription authorized towards refractory conscripts.

Sir, I am alarmed and dismayed by the extent of the evils involved in this system. Rely upon it, conscription will never be submitted to in this country; it will be resisted. If your system is adopted, I may be called to take a near view of a picture, in the front ground of which will be seen Governor Tompkins (an exempt under the plan) "prancing over the field, his horse's hoofs wet" with that blood which must flow in opposition to these laws. On the one hand may be seen some of the most respectable citizens of New York, starting back with grief and indignation, at the rude approach of a hardened outcast, who has scarcely grace enough left to endeavor to conceal his crimes, by covering them with his pardon. On the other side may be seen, a group of American freemen, handcuffed and in chains, reluctantly marching on the road to Canada. Turning from this view, and looking for relief to some other parts of the canvass, you will observe "Free trade and sailors' rights," in large staring capitals. As you approach, you perceive a figure covered with a thin veil—on examination, it proves to be the hideous and menacing aspect of Despotism, holding the sword of conscription in her hand, while the Goddess of Liberty lies cold and breathless at her feet.

The honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. TROUP) has told us, that this system is required by the situation of the country; he has expressed his opinion, also, that the people will cheerfully acquiesce. I think he is mistaken; the people of this country are not prepared for conscription—you have no right to impose it—you have no right to fasten chains upon the hands of freemen. They will prove to be the flaxen bands upon the arms of Sampson—he will rouse himself in his might and burst them. You say you will pass your law; that you will fasten it with a gordian knot, which cannot be untied. The swords of freemen then will cut it!

Mr. Chairman, it has been the habit of certain gentlemen here, to omit no occasion to charge the British Government with being arbitrary and tyrannical. But she affords no example to justify your present project of conscription. As to her armies, she has no law or practice which in any way resembles it. Instead of recruiting her armies by force, she gets them by voluntary enlistment; and so careful is she to prevent mischiefs from hasty and unadvised contracts, that the recruit under her practice, in all cases, has four days to revise his enlistment, and within that time the recruit must be discharged, on refunding the bounty money.

The only instance in which the practice of Great Britain can be claimed to justify the principle of conscription, is the practice of pressing sailors into their naval service. From my earliest infancy, I well remember to have heard this practice reprobated as an intolerable grievance; and, so far as my observation has extended, it has been very generally considered by this nation as arbitrary, tyrannical, and unjust. Indeed, this Administration, in their late instructions to our Ministers at Ghent, expressly say, that, "impressment is not an American practice, but is repugnant to our Constitution and our laws." And yet the late Secretary of the Navy, in his letter to the President of the Senate, on the sixteenth November, proposes a naval conscription; and says that he does not consider it "incompatible with the free spirit of our institutions, or with the rights of individuals."

It is not my intention to prove that the present Administration are the peculiar champions of "free trade and sailors' rights." Nor shall I stop to show the ardor and violence of that love which prompts them to seize upon the persons of seamen against their consent. My object in noticing this subject, is merely to show the universality of your conscription project; and incidentally to mark its resemblance to the practice of other nations.

The British practice of impressment, so far as it goes, corresponds in principle with your conscription; but it is much less general in its operation. The British press-gangs are not permitted to take any but sailors. Your plan embraces all the population of the country. The British, in cases of emergency, press sailors, who have all their lives been accustomed to the sea—fitted for the service, and fitted for nothing else. But this is a grievance, and the hardship is, that they force their sailors from merchant vessels into their public ships; and compel them to quit a service which is safe and profitable, for one more hazardous and less lucrative. But that your conscription plan is infinitely more oppressive than this, must be evident to everybody. Now, sir, let it be remembered, that the British practice of impressment, limited as it is to sailors, is not sanctioned by any statute—it is resorted to only in cases of emergency, and is justified on the ground of State necessity alone.

Perhaps some honorable gentleman here, who doubts the strict constitutionality of the conscription, may seek its justification in the necessities of the times. To such I would say, in the language of Jaffier to Pierre, "I tell thee, friend, if this your cause require, your cause is in a damned condition." On occasions much less important than this, I have heard on this floor, that, "in time of war the laws sleep." I am not now to learn, that cases may be imagined in which the necessities of the State must supersede the ordinary course of law, and in which private rights must be postponed to the safety of the nation. But the rule of "silent leges inter arma," has been quoted in debate, as applicable to the ordinary wants of the public, or its agents, in the management of war. Against this principle, thus applied, I beg leave solemnly to protest. In a Government of laws, it is not to be endured, that every petty officer, at a recruiting rendezvous, or on his march through the country, shall decide on the State necessity, and violate private rights at his will and pleasure. This is tyranny and oppression of the worst sort. The people of this country have no rights worth preserving, provided they can be sported with at the whim and caprice of every epauletted upstart. Sir, it is not the law of the land.

Nor can this State necessity be called in aid of this conscription. What! the leading measure for the permanent prosecution of the war, founded on usurpation! Do our laws sleep? I have been taught to believe that our laws never sleep. Has the operation of our laws been suspended? Why then do you mock this people with a show of legislation? Let us go home. Scatter the pages of your statute book to the winds of heaven. Your Constitution is the evidence of your rights, and the witness of your degradation—put it in the fire; it is made of paper, and like your Capitol, it will burn. But are we, indeed, reduced to this humiliating condition? Where is the author of our shame? Let him be pointed out, and you may, perhaps, view another act "of doubtful public spirit, at which morality is perplexed, reason is staggered, and from which affrighted nature recoils." Name the usurper, who claims to place himself above the law, and trample on the rights and liberties of a free people. Perhaps some modern Brutus may be found, rising "refulgent from the stroke of Cæsar's fate, amidst a crowd of patriots."

Mr. Chairman, the object of this conscription is, to fill the ranks of your army. By it, you propose to abandon all your former systems. By your first plan, you appealed, in a good degree, to the patriotism of the nation. That did not succeed. Your second proposition made the same call on the patriotism, and addressed itself also to the cupidity of the people. You failed in that, and you now propose a direct resort to force. It is a rule of political wisdom, that leading measures of Government, when once adopted, should not be departed from on slight causes. The respectability of a nation, in a great degree, depends on the stability of its institutions, and that Administration which expects to be useful to the people it governs, or held in respect by other nations, must adopt wise measures, and pursue them with steadiness and perseverance.

If these remarks are true, even if you had a Constitutional right to raise an army by the means proposed, prudence would seem to dictate that you should not exercise that right, except in a case of urgent necessity. On your own principles, does this urgent necessity exist? The war, you have uniformly said, was popular. The people have always been admitted to be patriotic, and the war has been said to be successful. Why, then, force your patriotic people into this popular war, which has been crowned with such success?

Whence arises the necessity for this conscription? It is said the state of affairs in Europe has placed vast means in the power of the enemy; that he has avowed the intention to prosecute this war with the utmost rigor and barbarity; that we must defend ourselves; and hence it is said arises a necessity for the measure now under consideration. If this is a fair statement of the case, the bill is wanted for the defence of the country. If the defence of the country was the real object of our rulers, I should not consider myself at liberty to withhold my assent to any Constitutional mode which might be proposed to raise supplies of men or money. While I should hold the Administration responsible for the present alarming state of the country; while I should consider that those who declared the war had failed in their essential duty "to provide for the common defence;" I should deem it the part of patriotism to unite in repelling the invaders of the country. If defence was the object, you should have my vote for a full system of finance, and for the most vigorous and effective military system which could be devised, consistent with the Constitution of the country. But the present system is one which, if adopted, must end in the destruction of this Government. Your affairs have been for some time in the inclined plane of ruin; do not, I beseech you, add to the weight by which they are descending. If you pass this law, you drive this country to destruction with accelerated velocity.

Conscription is not necessary for defensive measures, nor is the force to be raised by it intended for that object. Certainly, sir, you will not pay so poor a compliment to the patriotism of the people as to say, that you must resort to arbitrary and violent means to compel them to defend their country. So long as you continue to avow your weak and ambitious views of conquest, so long the recruiting service will not progress.

You want men and money, and you cannot expect to get men unless you have money. It is not to be expected that men will imbody for the defence of the nation for any considerable time, if you keep them on bad rations and no pay; but if you had money, and, under existing circumstances, would call on the nation for services limited to the defence of the nation, you could get men enough by voluntary enlistment. The great evil is, you have wasted the resources of the country—you have no money—the bills of your authorized and most confidential officers are every day dishonored. What is worse, you have no credit; you cannot borrow a dollar but at usurious interest; and the rate of interest must rise upon you, because the risk of the eventual repayment of the principal is every day increasing. What shall we do; pass this law? If you do, the Government is at an end; if you do not pass this law, I think there is too much reason to fear the affairs of the nation are irretrievable. You, who in June, 1812, declared the war, have neglected to provide the means for carrying it on. Without money you cannot meet your present engagements, much less can you raise another army. What, then, must be done; what can be done? My poor advice would be, to meet the crisis as it deserves. The crisis, indeed, is an awful one; and it becomes you, you, the majority, who now direct the destinies of the nation—it becomes you to breast yourselves to the storm which you see rising around you.

I know of but one way in which I think this country can be saved. Abandon the idle project of conquering a foreign territory; put yourselves on the defensive; deal honestly with the people; tell them that your plans for raising money have failed; tell them, what is true, that you are on the eve of bankruptcy, and throw yourselves on their magnanimity. Honorable gentlemen may lose their offices, but they may save their country. I do not think it possible for you to get money for conquest; you may, perhaps, raise it for defence. Having provided the money for supporting your army, use the means which the Constitution has put into your hands; raise men by voluntary enlistment; and, in cases of emergency, "call out the militia to repel invasion," and engage to pay them when you are able. It is not to be believed that the people of this country, under such circumstances, could be subjugated; but if you will send your regular armies to Canada, and leave the States defenceless, and refuse to pay the militia when called out by their proper officers, I will not answer for the result. The inevitable consequence of this course is, that the States must and will take care of themselves; and they will preserve the resources of the States for the defence of the States. If you will pursue the plan which I have just suggested, the people, in defence of their families, their homes, and their institutions, will rally to the standard of their country. In such a conflict you may rely on their patriotism and their zeal; they will fulfil every duty with cheerfulness and alacrity. Do not force them into your ranks for conquest. If you require them for defence, they will be found where danger presses and where glory calls; and they will bring with them that heroic courage which will cover you with glory in the day of battle; they will bring with them that elevated sentiment which raises the common man to the hero, and that holy enthusiasm which makes an army irresistible. I cannot persuade myself that conscription is necessary for the defence of the country.

Nor is the force contemplated to be raised by it intended for defence. I see no provision in any of the bills, which goes to limit its application to the defence of the country; and if a proposition should be made so to limit it, I make no doubt it would share the fate of a similar attempt, on a former occasion—it would be instantly rejected, and that too without discussion. As the plans submitted to us contain no provision of this kind, we must look elsewhere for the objects to which this army is to be applied. Hitherto the defence of the country has not been the leading object of Administration: the war has been conducted as a war of conquest and ambition. Yes, sir, the efficient part of the Army was tilting in Canada, while the affrighted inhabitants in this vicinity, with the President at their head, were seeking refuge by the light which ascended from the hill of your Capitol! The proclamation of Hull avowed the intention of conquest. He said he came to give the inhabitants of Canada "the blessings of civil and religious liberty." The redoubted Alexander Smyth (a General by commission) proclaimed that he was about to enter a territory, which, at no distant period, would form a part of the United States. In this House, the conquest of Canada has been again and again distinctly urged as an object of the war. A gentleman from Tennessee, not now a member of the House, (Mr. GRUNDY,) and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. INGERSOLL,) have both favored us with arguments on that subject, and I believe this has been a favorite plan on the war-side of the House. The Administration must, I think, be considered as committed by the proclamations of their Generals and the opinions of their friends.

But the letter of the Secretary of War ends all doubt on this subject. He proposes to bring into the field, for the next campaign, not less than one hundred thousand regular troops. Are these for the defence of the country? Are the services of the militia and volunteers to be dispensed with? No, sir; this force—the one hundred thousand regular troops—is to be "aided, in extraordinary exigencies, by volunteers and militia." And, again, he expressly says, that although the burdens of the militia may be in some cases lightened, yet, "reliance must still be placed on them for important aids, especially in cases of sudden invasion." Thus, you see, resort is still to be had to the militia, in the only case in which you have a right to their services. You have no power over the militia, except in the cases specified; and the exigency must exist, or the right to call out the militia does not exist. Trifling, indeed, will be the relief which the militia can expect from the plan of the Secretary. According to his views, and in his own words, "it will not be sufficient to repel the predatory and desolating incursions" of the enemy. "We must not be contented with defending ourselves." His object can only be obtained "by pushing the war into Canada."

Now, sir, let us not be told that this conscription is intended for the defence of the nation. I had hoped that the Administration would have grown wiser by experience, and that this project would have been abandoned by common consent. The war against the provinces of Canada is a war without object, for it is not worth the conquest; it is at the present time a war without hope, for you cannot take it. I would as soon attempt literally "to pluck bright honor from the pale-faced moon," as to attempt the conquest of Canada in the present state of the country, and under the auspices of this Administration.

Sir, the conquest of Canada must be a hopeless project under the direction of this Administration: they are utterly incompetent. On a former occasion, when I so sensibly felt the indulgence of this House, I undertook to examine the two first campaigns, and thought I found evidence for a thorough conviction that their claim to military talent was unfounded. My opinion, at that time, was put upon the record; and I have seen no reason to alter that opinion, in the history of the last campaign.

The military operations in the South, I believe, have been generally considered as successful. I have not a sufficient knowledge of that country to venture upon an examination of them. I cannot, however, in this place, omit to express my admiration and respect for Colonel Pearson, of North Carolina, who conducted the expedition against the Indians, in a manner not less creditable to his military talents than to the excellence of his heart. The youthful soldier will look to this accomplished officer as a pattern well worthy of imitation; and the philanthropist will point to the scene of his glory, on the Alabama, not only to disprove the assertion that wars against Indians must be conducted on the principle of extermination, but also to discourage the atrocious conduct, which we have sometimes witnessed, in carrying that principle into effect.

My local situation has led me to observe the Northern campaign with some attention; and I feel justified in saying, it will not stand the test of military criticism. I pass over the want of attention to the supplies so necessary to the comforts of an army, nor will I dwell upon the shameful waste and prodigality, so apparent to every one in the vicinity of our camps, and the neglect to provide the necessary means of transportation, in all the marches and counter-marches which we have witnessed in that quarter. Time would fail me to notice the many departures from military rules, in other minor arrangements for the campaign. I pass over all these, and come to examine the operations on the Niagara River, and at Lake Champlain. These, I believe, are considered by the friends of Administration as affording ample evidence of a just claim to military talent.

In looking at the events of the war on the Northern frontier, I find cause to bestow almost unbounded praise on the officers who conducted and the brave men who executed the enterprises; but I can see little reason to admit the claim of Administration to prudence or forecast. Under the auspices of General Brown, the military character of the people has been retrieved, and the tone of the Army raised to no common pitch. I feel the full weight of the services of that General and his associates, and have not been backward in expressing these feelings. But no practical good has resulted from the operations there, except in raising the character of the Army. The officers and men employed on this service are not to blame for it, they did everything which men could do, with their means and under their circumstances. Acquitting the officers and the men, I must hold the Administration responsible for not furnishing the means necessary to effect the object contemplated. The means furnished were utterly disproportioned to the end. The object of General Brown was to seize the post of the enemy at Burlington Heights, and to press from thence to Kingston. Can any one say, that the means furnished were competent to either of these objects? No, sir. The first battle on the Niagara, in which our troops were successful, and where General Scott covered himself with glory—that battle settled the fate of the campaign. General Brown, from that instant, knew that his purpose of penetrating into Canada was frustrated; offensive operations, with a view to the possession of the country, were abandoned. Our army, as was right, fell back, and all the subsequent battles were fought, not in the expectation of driving the enemy from the peninsula, but, on the mere point of honor, whether our forces should or should not re-cross the Niagara river. This is apparent to every man who has attended to that campaign. In all the enterprises new lustre was added to our arms; in every instance we claimed the victory, and yet we did not attempt to penetrate into the country. The prudence of the General foresaw that such an attempt would have been idle and ruinous. He gained the point of honor; he retained his post till the end of the campaign, and the army has since gone into Winter quarters on this side of the Niagara. This, I believe, is a fair examination of that campaign. The Administration deserve no credit, but are justly censurable for the part they have acted.

One other fact ought to be noticed. The two most important military posts which we had on the Western waters are Michilimackinac and Niagara. Both these are in the hands of the enemy, and held in proud defiance. Administration did set on foot an expedition to recover Michilimackinac, but, according to custom, the necessary means were not afforded, and the enterprise failed. As to Fort Niagara, it was not even attempted. And both these important posts yet remain in the possession of the enemy, the monuments of the folly and imbecility of our National Councils.

Let us now look towards Lake Champlain, and notice the events of the war in that quarter. We all remember, that, when our army made their escape across the St. Lawrence, about a year ago, they took post at French Mills, with a view to preserve their boats, and other necessary means, preparatory to a descent on Montreal. I well remember, too, that we were consoled for the loss and disgrace of the campaign, which had just closed, by assurances that our army should positively take Montreal in the Spring, before the enemy could be reinforced from beyond the Atlantic. Scarcely had the remnant of our gallant troops begun to be comfortable in their quarters at French Mills, before they were ordered to strike their tents. The boats were burnt; provisions and all the supplies usually found in a camp were ordered to be destroyed, for fear they might fall into the hands of the enemy; and so precipitate was the retreat, that very large quantities of military stores did actually fall into the hands of the British, who remained in quiet possession of the post which our army had abandoned, and leisurely removed everything which they considered of value. Under these circumstances, however, comforters were found, who had no doubt that it was all right to concentrate our forces, and that we should see wonders in the Spring. Well, the Spring at length arrived, and with it the expectation of a rich harvest of glory. The campaign opened with an attack on La Cole Mill. We know the result. The officer who conducted it is now once again on trial.

In the latter stages of our operations on Lake Champlain, with pleasure and with pride we can view the gallantry and good conduct of officers and men, both on the water and the land. And here—more fortunate than on the Niagara—we can look, with gratitude, to the practical good resulting from these services. But, the Administration deserves the severest censure. The officers at the head of both our naval and land forces, and their brave associates, have all deserved well of their country. The name of Macdonough shall live forever. The opportunity presented; on that instant—

“He snatch’d, to grace Columbia’s infant name,
“Old Neptune’s trident and Old England’s fame.”

I certainly do not intend to praise him; he is above all praise. The conduct of General Maccomb deserved what it has received—the admiration and gratitude of his country. I scarcely know how to express my admiration of that daring gallantry which determined him to maintain his post against the fearful odds of the enemy. The skill and promptness with which the defences of the camp were formed, and the judicious distribution of the troops, all reflect the highest honor on that General. The situation of General Macomb was more critical and hazardous than that of any other officer during the war. More cannot be said in his favor, than to say his conduct was exactly the reverse of what was witnessed in the base, inglorious surrender of this city.

But how stands the conduct of the Administration? At the opening of the campaign, their object was to take Montreal; and the opinion of their friends excited a pretty general expectation of success. But, after the attempt on La Cole Mill, all reasonable hope of seizing Montreal appears to have vanished. No further demonstrations were made on Montreal; and the enemy, in turn, began to think of invading us. His project, to be sure, was gigantic, but if he had met with no more resistance than he did in this District, it might have been accomplished. What was the object of the enemy?

According to Governor Tompkins, it was "to penetrate with his Northern army by the waters of Lake Champlain and the Hudson; and by a simultaneous attack with his maritime force on New York, to form a junction to sever the communication of the States." In this view of the object of the enemy, it is manifest that the position of our army at Plattsburg was infinitely more important than that at Fort Erie. And what did this wise Administration do? Did they strengthen the post at Plattsburg? Did they collect all their disposable force and throw in relief? Exactly the reverse. At the very instant that Sir George Prevost was preparing to execute this plan, General Izard was ordered to withdraw the main body of the army, and General Macomb was left at Plattsburg, with scarce fifteen hundred regular troops to oppose fourteen thousand British veterans, led on by the Commander-in-Chief and all his ablest Generals. The folly of this arrangement is the more apparent, when it is remembered that General Brown was fighting merely for the point of honor. And besides, the order for General Izard to join the army on the Niagara was given at such an advanced stage of the season, that he did not reach there till the time for military operations had passed by. The campaign closed about the time General Izard arrived on the Niagara—the bird had flown. General Drummond went into Winter quarters at Kingston; and our troops have wisely blown up Fort Erie, and abandoned the Canada side of the Niagara. And all this took place at the very instant when every suggestion of prudence pointed directly to Plattsburg, as much the most important post.

Examine this subject, and you will see folly and infatuation written on every part of it. Instead of ordering General Izard to join General Brown, common sense required that General Brown should have been directed to join General Izard. Sound policy loudly declared against the removal of the army from Plattsburg; but, if they were removed at all, they should have remained at Sackett's Harbor, which they passed on their way to Niagara. This, sir, cannot be doubted; for General Izard had scarcely left the Harbor—the rations which he took from thence were scarcely expended—before Sackett's Harbor was menaced, and the militia of the country called out en masse to defend it; and after a severe tour of duty, on bad rations, they have returned to their homes without pay. And yet this Administration is well suited to manage the affairs of this nation!

As to the part the Administration took on the Niagara frontier, I think I have shown they deserved but little credit; and the view just given of their management on Lake Champlain must forever silence their claim to military skill. The honor and glory is due to those who conducted the enterprises; certainly not to those who planned the expeditions, and failed to provide the means necessary to carry them into effect. Too much cannot be said of the officers. Posterity will do justice to General Brown. The brow of General Scott is crowned with unfading laurels. And the historian, who shall speak of the situation and conduct of General Macomb at Plattsburg, will proudly mark the resemblance it bears to that of Leonidas at the straits of Thermopylæ. While the American people will fondly gaze at Macdonough by the side of Perry, the twin stars in the galaxy of our naval heroes, they will not fail to pronounce that the conduct of the Administration has been marked by folly and improvidence.

Depend upon it, sir, Canada is not to be taken by the present men in power. Under the circumstances of the country the project is hopeless. The people of this country, however ready and able to defend their firesides and their institutions, are opposed to the conquest of Canada. Your army is frittered to nothing—your Treasury exhibits a "beggary account of empty boxes;" yet this Administration, with a perfect knowledge of the facts—with hearts yet panting from the affrighted plains of Bladensburg—in full view of the ruins of the Capitol—with the flames of the palace still crackling in their ears—will posterity believe it? That, under such circumstances, this Administration sat down quietly and philosophically to devise a plan for the conquest of Canada. Well may it be said, "Quos Deus vult perdere, prius dementat." Did I not know that this Administration was composed of philosophers, I would swear to you, Mr. Chairman, they were mad, stark staring mad, and entitled to all the hellebore in Anticyra. I can view this project of conquering Canada, under present circumstances, in no other light than as the last desperate effort of expiring madness.

But Canada must be conquered, and by an army of American conscripts. The conquest of a neighboring province has frequently been followed by the loss of the liberties of the conquering nation. But we are called upon to surrender our liberties as preliminary to conquest. The army of conscripts, on its way to Canada, must, at every step, trample on the Constitution of the country. This is worse than was predicted. Experience, history, and the nature of man, had taught us to believe that the victorious army, which was to "dictate the terms of peace at Quebec, or at Halifax," might, on its return, be dangerous to the liberties of this country. But few indeed could have believed that our rulers would have required us to sacrifice the Constitution in order to raise an army for such a conquest. The freedom of other nations has fallen by the ambition of tyrants, at the head of conquering armies. But we are called to give up ours—to whom? Our fate is not less hard than that of other nations, but is to be much more humiliating and inglorious. Cæsar, returning from Gaul, at the head of his victorious cohorts, trampled on the laws of his country, passed the Rubicon, and marched to Rome. It was not until Cromwell had possessed himself of his infatuated army that he dared to take the Kingdom of Great Britain under his holy protection. And it was from the plains of Italy that Bonaparte brought his witnesses to the Crown of the ancient Kings of France. But we are called upon to surrender all that is sacred and dear to freemen—to whom? Not to some haughty chieftain, with his vassals at his heels; not to a dashing soldier of fortune, the glory of whose exploits might shed some lustre on our chains—but to whom? To Knights of the Spur, whose horses are scarce yet groomed from the races at Bladensburg. If the people of this country are prepared to receive chains from masters like these, I will only say they richly deserve such masters and such chains.

Gentlemen have often intimated, that the object of the minority was power and place rather than the good of the country. To that charge I plead not guilty. I am not competent to office; and if I had the talent, I have not the disposition to accept any. I look to the day which shall free me from my public duties here as one of the happiest of my life. As to my friends, I must admit they are ambitious; but their ambition seeks to save the country, not to rule it. We have a stake in this community equal to other gentlemen. To what should we be unfaithful? To that Constitution which we have sworn to support? To that land which gave us birth? Where are our families, our altars, and our firesides? Where are the bones of our children and the ashes of our ancestors? It is not to be believed that these duties and these privileges are to be abandoned for any motive of personal ambition.

If the object was merely to strip you of your robes of office, depend upon it my friends would not endeavor to arrest you in your present career. Be warned by experience. Look at the fate of the most remarkable man of this or any other time; he fell from the pinnacle of ambition, and by conscription. Mark the progress of this prodigy of the age—this wonder of the world! See him with daring hand seize the Crown which had lately fallen from the head of the amiable and unfortunate Louis. See him at the zenith of his glory—observe this Colossus, with one foot on Portugal and with the other planted on the territory of the Czars—with one hand controlling the destinies of the Baltic, and with the other pointing to his dependents on the Eastern verge of continental Europe. Mark the contrast! "How are the mighty fallen!" Where and what is he? A State prisoner in the Island of Elba—a pensioner on the bounty of the Bourbons.

"The desolator, desolate,
"The victor overthrown;
"The arbiter of others' fate,
"A suppliant for his own."

Take warning by this example. Bonaparte split on this rock of conscription; if you travel the same road you must share the same destiny. The needle by which you have directed your political course has been for some time trembling in the gale of experiments; it seems now to be settled, and points with unerring polarity to ruin.

There is another view of this subject which honorable gentlemen ought well to consider. The tendency of your whole system is to destroy the bond of union which connects us together. Let me not be charged with any wish to separate the States; I disclaim it. I have cherished the union of these States with an ardor, with an enthusiasm, not inferior to any other gentleman in or out of this House. But all your measures seem to point to separation. The defence of the States has not been a leading object of this war. The States, however, must be defended; if you will not protect them, if you refuse to pay the expense necessarily incurred for that object, they will take care of themselves. The natural consequence is, the States will preserve their own resources for their own defence; and the practical result will be a dissolution of the Union.

If you resort to conscription you will have a commentary upon it written in the blood of this country. I beg gentlemen to remember the days when York and Lancaster drew forth their battles. They appear to me to be fast returning. Serious discontents already exist in many parts of the United States. Causes already exist which are claimed to justify a dissolution of the Union; and, rather than submit to a military conscription, there are States who may consider themselves bound by duty and interest to withdraw from this Confederacy. You will say they have not justifiable cause. I entreat you not to afford them a plausible pretext. I am no alarmist; nor is this view of the subject taken for any purpose of threat or intimidation. I give it as my opinion, and you will, I dare say, receive it for as much as it is worth. I have carefully examined this conscription question, with all that seriousness and attention required by the solemnity of the occasion; I have exercised that small measure of talent which it has pleased the Almighty to bestow upon me, and I have arrived at this conclusion: the plan of conscription violates the Constitution; it trenches on the rights of the States, and takes from them their "necessary security;" it destroys all claim to personal freedom; it will poison all the comforts of this people. In this belief I can have no hesitation to say, that I think it will be resisted, and that it ought to be resisted.

Sir, I speak not particularly of this bill immediately before your committee—I allude to the conscription system as proposed by the Secretary of War. To use the language of a former member of this House, (Mr. Edward Livingston, of New York, on the alien bill in 1798,) who was a distinguished leader of the present majority, I ask, whether the people of this country are “base enough to be prepared for this? No, sir, they will, I repeat it, they will resist this tyrannic system. The people will oppose—the States will not submit to its operation—they ought not to acquiesce, and I pray to God they never may.”

Mr. Chairman, the view I have taken of our public affairs has filled me with gloom and despondency. Life and all its enjoyments are with me much diminished in value. The plot of this political drama has been for some thickening; the catastrophe is at hand. We live in an age of wonders. It has been our lot to witness some of the most remarkable events which have ever taken place in the moral, political, or physical world. In common with others I have marked the signs of the times, and look to their development with the most awful forebodings. It is perhaps possible that this country may escape destruction; I hope it may. But when I see ruin and desolation staring us in the face, although I am not given to superstition, I cannot but remember that I have seen comets blaze, and the sun struggle under a total eclipse. I hope, sir, almost against all hope, that the freedom of our institutions may be preserved; but when I see this system of conscription about to be forced upon us, although I can scarcely bring myself to believe in omens, yet I feel an unusual emotion at the recollection that the Goddess of Liberty was burnt up in your Capitol.

If this military conscription becomes the law of the land, the freedom of this country is destroyed, and the union of the States is gone for ever!

When Mr. M. had concluded, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, December 9.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of the Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and by amending the act laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors, were read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill “to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America;” in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill “to provide additional revenue for defraying the expenses of the Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on various goods, wares and merchandise manufactured within the United States”—which bill was twice read and committed.

Mr. EPPES, also reported a bill “to provide additional revenue for defraying the expenses of the Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, on horses kept exclusively for the saddle or carriage, and on gold and silver watches.”

The bill from the Senate for the relief of John C. Hurlburt, was twice read and committed.

MILITIA DRAUGHTS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill authorizing the President of the United States to call into service 80,430 militia, for the defence of the frontiers of the United States.

The motion to strike out the first section being yet under consideration—

Mr. BARNETT, of Georgia, and Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, opposed the motion to strike out.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, spoke in favor of the motion.

Mr. DUVALL, of Kentucky, spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman: My desire to address the Committee on the present bill, does not arise from the hope of either fame or distinction. These can only belong to great talents and distinguished action. But, sir, I am impelled by my judgment and duty to protest against the opinions and doctrines which have been advanced by the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. MILLER,) on the various subjects which he has brought before this Committee—opinions and objections against the powers of Congress, which, if they unfortunately should be brought into practice, would overturn every principle of civil liberty, destroy all subordination and union, and rend into pieces the Constitution of the country. Before I proceed to examine the arguments of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. MILLER,) permit me to say, I am opposed to striking out any part of this bill, unless I can be persuaded, in an hour of alarm and peril, to surrender the rights and liberties of the nation. The provisions contained in this bill are not only proper, but absolutely necessary. The rejection of the measure would be to disarm the nation, and increase the calamities of war. I had hoped that, as the motion of the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EPPES) had prevailed, to reduce the term of militia service from two years to one, that all further objections on the part of the Opposition would vanish. I did not long remain in this error. All the clamor of party has been roused by this measure, and, by gentlemen in the opposition, it is loudly denounced as odious, tyrannical, and unconstitutional. Sir, I had hoped that the stormy passions of party were in a great measure allayed by the perilous situation of the country. Opposed to a powerful and ambitious enemy, who is collecting all the deluge of war to pour on this devoted land, with a Treasury exhausted, and a gallant army reduced in numbers but not in spirit, I, indeed, had hoped that gentlemen in the opposition (under these circumstances) would have stood forward to defend their soil and sovereignty. In this hope I have not altogether been disappointed. Some gentlemen of high and distinguished talents, who now stand at the head of the Federal party, have declared their determination to vote the supplies for the Government, and, on several occasions, have nobly triumphed over their feelings, and placed themselves on American ground. This is the duty of every American; they owe it to themselves and their country. I ask not gentlemen to sacrifice their principles. Surely, when their aid is demanded to preserve our rights, let them expose the errors of the Administration; let them expose the policy which has been pursued by the dominant party; let them endeavor to convince the people that their confidence has been misplaced and abused; nay, let them exert all their powers to change the rulers of the nation, and call other men and measures into action. But, in the name of our common country, I call on them to prepare to meet an enemy as implacable as he is powerful. The member from New York (Mr. MILLER) commenced his arguments against this bill, by gravely informing the Committee that he not only objected to this, but to all the military plans which had been offered, because, he says, they are coercive. Will the gentleman be so obliging as to inform us how long it has been since he made this important discovery? That the civil, criminal, and military laws of this country should be coercive on its citizens, is surely tyrannical. But, until the learned gentleman can point out to me a country whose laws have no penalties, and whose military code is not coercive, I must be permitted to believe this strange and visionary notion has been only drawn from Plato's ideal republic. Indeed, sir, this argument is an excellent specimen of the lengthy, and learned, and elaborate speech delivered by the gentleman on this subject; the whole of which was no doubt the offspring of much painful reflection and deep research. It was the most logical, historical, and tragical discourse, that ever was delivered in a legislative body. I was at a loss to determine, whether most to admire his powers as an historian, his clearness as a logician, or the refined excellence of his poetic fancy. It is rare that one individual excels in more than one science or accomplishment, but the honorable gentleman from New York is surely an exception. I feel half inclined to complain of the brilliancy of his fancy, for it threw such a dazzling flood of light around his subject and arguments, that I must own my mind was often so bewildered as not to comprehend all his nice and excellent deductions; but this was certainly my fault, or rather my misfortune, for the eye of real genius is always clearest and brightest in the blaze of science.

The Committee will pardon this digression; it was justly due to the gentleman. This bill has been called conscription, for the purpose of rendering it odious to the people. It is not the first time that a measure has been denounced by some peculiar name, in order to produce opposition, or to defeat its object. Such a shallow artifice cannot deceive any but those who are willing to be deluded. The gentleman from New York (Mr. MILLER) read to the Committee some pages of most pathetic declamation on the distressing scenes which conscription had produced in France; but he forgot to show the coincidence between the bill now before us and the conscription code of France. I say there is no coincidence; no, not even in the classification, and still less in any other feature. The conscription laws of France were first introduced by their Directory, and are in strict imitation of the Roman discipline, which compelled every citizen to become a soldier. They were adopted for the purpose of aggrandizement and conquest. All Frenchmen were classed between the ages of twenty and twenty-five only; in this particular it was oppressive and unjust. The conscripts were often treated with the utmost cruelty, and if they deserted their parents were made responsible for their appearance, or their fortunes paid an exorbitant fine. All this, too, was done to carry on foreign wars without their consent, to gratify an ambitious tyrant. The people of France were controlled by the iron rod of a military despot, who was only governed by his interest and glory. They made no laws—their voice was not heard in their councils. Day after day, and year after year, were they dragged unwilling victims to fight the wars of their master in every part of their continent. The young men saw no termination to their military toils but in the arms of death; and if they survived the period assigned for military service, they were but seldom rewarded for the scars which they bore, while unusual hardships and constant exposure entailed upon them poverty and premature old age. No wonder can then be excited when we are told that the people of France dreaded and execrated conscription.

Let us now examine this American bill, and compare it with the conscription of France. First, all the free male population of the United States, over the age of eighteen and under forty-five, are bound to render military service whenever they are legally draughted. The section which permits a class to exonerate itself by furnishing one recruit for the regular army, so far from being objectionable, is, in fact, an advantage to the whole body of militia. This difference, and the extension of the term of service six months longer than usual, are the only changes in the militia laws now in operation.

If this is conscription, it was practised during our Revolution. It has been the invariable practice during the present war, and must continue so long as we are governed by the Constitution. It is nothing more than the people of these States expected, when they instructed their Representatives in Congress to declare war with Great Britain. If this be called conscription by the Opposition, it is equally so to bring the militia into the field for six or three months; nay, even for a single day. But the member from New York, (Mr. MILLER,) and his friends, feeling that this argument was too weak to support them even for a moment, turned to the Constitution, and endeavored to base their reasonings on its sacred principles. Sir, in this they have failed, and their attempt has only more clearly exposed the error of their doctrines. The militia belong to the States, it is urged, and Congress have no right to call them into service, for they may be wanted for State defence.

I answer—the General Government is bound to provide for the weal and protection of every State in the Union. That the Constitution gives to Congress the power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States. That it also invests Congress with power to call forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions. Will it be denied that our country is now invaded? No, this must be admitted by the most incredulous. Yet, possessing these powers, and under these circumstances, we are told that this bill is unconstitutional. I ask gentlemen if the very compact which they guard with so much watchfulness, does not recognise the militia as the bulwark of our liberties? And yet they say, in effect, that Congress cannot command their services. Before my mind can assent to this strange contradiction, and extraordinary opinion, gentlemen must prove to me that it is unconstitutional to call the militia into service for six or three months, or even for a day; for their reasons will apply as strong in every instance I have mentioned, as they can against this bill.

The member from New York (Mr. MILLER) with great emotion has declared that, were he to vote for this bill, he should disgrace the ashes of his fathers, that it violates the rights of the people, who ought to be suffered quietly to enjoy their own firesides. I will tell the gentleman that he can never disgrace the ashes of his fathers by defending his country; they have given to him an example that should awaken all his pride to emulate; they never refused to defend the soil and independence which their noble valor has since given to their posterity; could their pure and generous spirits witness these scenes, and hear such sentiments, they would weep angel tears over the degeneracy and ingratitude of their sons. But we should enjoy our firesides! What enjoyment, let me inquire, is to be found in this enviable situation, when war is striding over the people, breathing destruction on our borders? Can the member from New York (Mr. MILLER) feel, in times such as these, the quiet and enjoyment of which he speaks? No, in the interest which he has taken in our various campaigns, in the minute recital of our misfortunes, in the painful and melancholy feelings which he has illustrated by such frequent quotations of the poetic language of the great dramatist, it is disclosed that he reposes not in these times in quiet content by his own fireside; let us not talk of these enjoyments in the strife of war—this theme the American will reserve for the halcyon days of peace.

But the member from New York (Mr. MILLER) has said, that this nation can only be saved by reviving its credit, and recruiting its armies; yet he declares that his assent shall not be given to this end, although he has told us this, and this only, can save the nation. Is it possible that the honorable member is so lost to duty and love of country, that, under no situation in which he may be placed, will he give his aid to provide men or money for defence?

[Here Mr. MILLER rose, and said he was misunderstood by the gentleman from Kentucky; that he had said he would not give any supplies to the Government for the conquest of Canada; but that if our army was withdrawn from that country, and the project of conquest relinquished, he would go as far as any gentleman to raise men and money for defence.]

Mr. DUVALL regretted he had misunderstood the gentleman; that it was neither his object or inclination to misstate his arguments, and no gentleman would accuse him of so mean a subterfuge.

It was but the other day that the member from New York (Mr. MILLER) declared on this floor, that the Government had abandoned every object for which this war was commenced. I take him at his word, and the supposed conquest of Canada cannot now be an obstacle; but, to remove his fear of conquest, let me offer him proof which is undeniable, to dissipate the inquietude which he still feels on this subject. I mean the instructions given to our Ministers, and the offer to make peace on their part with the British commissioners, on terms of which they have no right to complain. How, then, can it be seriously urged that this is a war of conquest? Even the gentleman himself has said, that all the objects for which this war was declared are now abandoned. In one breath we are told it would be dangerous to the liberties of the people to place at the disposal, and under the control of the men in power, a great military force; in the next moment the same gentleman declares that the Administration have neither talents nor capacity to carry on the war; and that such is their imbecility, that were they to furnish the supplies they would be profusely and ineffectually expended. I leave such absurd contradictions to be reconciled by those who claim them as just and unanswerable arguments.

But, said the gentleman, (Mr. MILLER,) beware how you trample on the rights of your citizens, for remember justice never sleeps; I lament that his conduct has not proved the truth of his remark. Justice among the great body of the people I trust will never sleep, but with some in the opposition she even now slumbers unto death. Justice expired with the gentleman and some of his friends in the opposition, when they declared in this Hall, and in the face of the whole nation, that this war is wicked and unjust.

That the nation commenced the war before they were prepared, was, and is yet, my opinion. But that we had not ample cause to justify our resort to arms, I do deny. Was it wicked and unjust to resist the enemy in their illegal decrees and blockades? Was it wicked and unjust to resist the capture and confiscation of our vessels and cargoes? Was it wicked and unjust to resist the impressment of our seamen? If none of these contain the wickedness and injustice of which gentlemen complain, I ask in what does it exist? Let gentlemen no longer refuse their assistance; let them not sit calmly by and see the farms of their citizens pillaged, their habitations wrapped in flames; and when the voice of maddening distress shall assail them with petitions, coldly answer, we will not aid or protect you, for this war is wicked and unjust. When our territory is invaded by your enemy, and he bids defiance to your arms; when your citizens, no longer able to resist their iniquitous and rapacious demands, call on you for protection, which you have solemnly sworn under our Constitution to give, will you violate the high obligation, and answer, it cannot be given, for this war is wicked and unjust? Have you not heard the cries of distress arising from ruffian profanation? Have you not marked the spots where your cities and hamlets once stood, whose ashes have been slaked with the blood of your citizens? and, yet, are you calm and undisturbed, refusing to redress their sufferings, or to aid in the punishment of the incendiary myrmidons who have violated your people, because you say this war is wicked and unjust?

In vain may the citizens of your Indian frontier recite their sad and dreadful sufferings. The exterminating warfare of a merciless foe, whose joy in blood rises to madness, is suffered, with your consent, to rage with death and desolation on your borders. The rude children of the brave and daring hunter, and the family of the unoffending and peaceable emigrant, sink alike beneath the arm of their savage foe. Do they desire your protection? Yes; but you sternly bid them die, because you still say that this war is wicked and unjust.

I would ask, from what does this apathy, on the part of many in the opposition originate? I fear, from local distinctions and invidious remarks, which, with regret and pain, I have so often heard thrown out in the warmth of discussion. There is a class of politicians in this country who have, for years, with the most unwearied industry and artifice, endeavored to make the Eastern and Northern sections of this Union believe that the Southern and Western States are jealous of their increasing wealth and commercial importance. This opinion has been supported and encouraged by demagogues, for base and perfidious purposes. The good sense of the nation (it is the hope of every American) will soon correct so fatal an opinion. The happiness and interest of all the States are linked together by every tie that can bind society—speaking the same language, living under the same general laws, connected by marriage, blood, and friendship, and worshipping the same great benevolent Being—how can stronger connexion exist? Is interest more binding? Be it so. The North and East are commercial; the South and the West are engaged in agriculture; if commerce is impeded or suspended, the ships of our merchants are idle and decaying; the produce of the South and West remain on the planter's or farmer's hands, dead, wasting, and unproductive, or becomes spoiled, unfit for market, and is wholly lost. Nature intended that the Northern and Eastern States should produce the daring and enterprising mariners of the Union; to make them so, she has given to them fine bays, harbors, and rivers; she has placed the fisheries in their neighborhood as a nursery for their seamen; their climate is cold, and soil unsuited to the various productions of raw material necessary for their factories, which are found in abundance in the South and West. New England will not only possess the carrying trade of the South and West, but will, from her great and increasing population, necessarily become their manufacturer. All this is so obvious and certain, that the demagogues of either party cannot long deceive the people, by crying out that their interests are separate and distinct. Away, then, with invidious sectional distinctions; let us speak of ourselves as a nation, and not as separate hordes of wrangling and jealous savages. The bold and enterprising mariner of the North may proudly rank with the first in the nation. Yes, sir, these are the men who belong to your Navy, who have acquired more glory in two years for themselves and country, than ever England could boast in half a century; a gem which shall shine with undiminished splendor down the long annals of time. This nation should never, in peace, forget that a Navy is her right arm in war.

It was with pleasure I listened to the gentleman from New York while he praised the valor of our land and naval commanders, and I could not but deem it strange that he, who seemed so animated at his own recital of their gallant deeds, should yet refuse to follow their example in defending his country.

I did not hope to follow the gentleman from New York through all the various remarks which he pressed into this discussion; nor can I follow him in the sublime poetic effusions and numberless quotations from celebrated authors. Indeed, sir, it seemed to me that the gentleman's speech was not made for the present bill, but for the bill which has been reported to this House by the honorable chairman (Mr. TROUP) of the Military Committee; but, as it is probable it will not be acted on, the honorable member from New York has transferred his objection from that to the bill from the Senate. But nothing is impossible to great genius; no subject is too high or too low to escape its subtle attention. It delights to bring objects and things, radically different, together; and, like electricity, its course is brilliant, wild, and eccentric. Hence, we may account for the introduction of Governor Tompkins and his charger by the honorable member, to this Committee, caparisoned in all the pomp of war; and also for the rapid flight which he instantly took from the back of this war horse, as he said, "to pluck bright honor from the pale-faced moon," where, for the present, I leave the gentleman.

The attention of the Committee shall not be claimed much longer by me, for I throw by many remarks, which have been made in the course of debate, in order to call your reflections to a subject that has been too often agitated to escape reply. I mean the doctrine of rebellion, which has been trumpeted in our ears by more than one member of this body. It is time that gentlemen in the Opposition should allay the fury of passion by the exercise of reason and calm inquiry. Can one individual in this body be found who will advocate principles destructive of the happiness and Constitution of his country? Yes, this House has heard discord and rebellion encouraged and avowed from more than one quarter. The member from New York (Mr. MILLER) has declared that this militia system, or, as he terms it, conscription, will not be submitted to by the people; that they ought to resist such oppression, such infringements of their rights, and he hoped they would resist.

[Here Mr. MILLER rose to explain, and said that the language he had used, were the words of Mr. Livingston, a Democrat, and were delivered in a speech when he was opposed to Mr. Adams's Administration; and he (Mr. M.) now adopted them as his own.]

Mr. DUVALL said, he had so understood the gentleman, and although he claimed the benefit of the example introduced, it was not on that account the less mischievous and pernicious; that demagogues belonged to all parties, and were equally to be detested and condemned. Let gentlemen who are giving tone and encouragement to rebellion, beware of the consequences; for, I tell them, they are treading over a burning volcano that may burst upon them in dreadful ruin. Do they propose to better their conditions, or the condition of their country, by such dangerous and mad contention? If so, let me drive from them far the fatal delusion. Look to the French Revolution, and learn, in time, to avoid the bloody scenes which may and will be reacted in America. How many of all the numerous and daring revolutionists of France are now in existence? Few, indeed, compared to the many who have fallen before the power of that rebellion, which owed to them its spring and creation. All France did not produce, with her millions of men, a single individual who could snatch the helm and wield the sword of the nation. Such men are rare creations of nature—five centuries will not produce such another man as the Corsican, who braved the tempest of Revolution, and rode on surges of blood to the imperial throne of France.

Beware, in time, beware, of the fate that will attend your temerity; for, believe me when I tell you, you, who create, are not the men that can control the tide of rebellion; you, first of all, shall be overwhelmed by its resistless fury. Deceive not yourselves and friends with the vain and foolish hope that you can "mount the whirlwind and direct the storm," for you will be scattered before it "like chaff before the wind of heaven."

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman, it seems to be the determination of gentlemen to debate all the military, and all the national subjects too, on the present motion. I had hoped that discussion would have been reserved for the consideration of the resolutions I laid on the table the day before yesterday, and which it was my intention to have called up the moment the present business is disposed of. I never much liked this bill. It embraces the same principles without the powerful effects of the other plan, with a greater complication of machinery. It was, originally, but a weak, diluted measure, in my opinion, and a bad substitute for the direct classification and draught into the regular armies, which I hold to be the best, and indeed the only efficient system. I had resolved, however, to vote for the bill, because I do not perceive that it may not serve as an accessory to the classification; and even, eviscerated as it has been by the success of the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES,) to reduce the term of service from two years to one, I do not yet say that I will withhold from it my support. Something must be done.

To be insensible to the extreme importance of time at this crisis is to be insensible to the crisis itself. This is the moment for action, not declamation; and gentlemen on both sides may rest assured that their controversies are, like a sea-fight, surrounded by a mass of destructive element infinitely more to be apprehended than their own ability to injure each other—an element of destruction, which, if neglected or provoked, will swallow up both the contending parties together, while they are vainly striving which shall overthrow the other. To change the illustration, we are in conflict, sir, as it were, in a vast place of interment, where eternity yawns upon us from ten thousand mouths, and where, whichever party brings his antagonist to the earth, can achieve no more enviable victory than that of being buried altogether in the same unhonored grave. Gentlemen seem to think, sir, that their constituents sent them here with no other purpose than to pull down one Administration and supplant it with another. They tell us, with one breath, that the present Administration was forced into this war, and with the next breath, they make the Administration answerable for all its misfortunes. They denounce that Administration as the most imbecile, indigent, and despicable in the world; and yet, with all the wealth, and all the talents, they have in vain withheld their wealth, in vain exercised their talents to thrust this miserable obstacle from their course. They possess, exclusively, all the physical resources, and all the patriotic attachments of the soil of the country—the bone, marrow, sinews, and vitals of the State—and they come here to reproach Administration for not having prevented or defeated a sudden inroad upon this Capital, while a portion of their own territory has been, for six months, in the undisputed occupation of the enemy—subdued without resistance, and held without an effort to regain it. We can all recollect, Mr. Chairman, how the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. WEBSTER,) in particular, demonstrated to us, about this time last year, that our war was unpopular and unjust; how he entertained us with distinctions between war offensive and war defensive; between the mercenary spirit of extra-territorial conquest and aggrandizement on the one hand, and the generous ardor of repelling invasion on the other; how he proved our inability to conquer Canada without the cordial co-operation of New England; and how speedily Canada would be overrun and subdued if his immediate fellow-citizens could be enlisted into the cause, instead of the armies—and yet, now that the war has become defensive to them; now that it has pushed itself into their plantations; now that the conqueror rings the knell of a curfew every evening over their own firesides, not a note of preparation or resistance do we hear from their mountains or their seaboard, nor any other note but that of rejoicing in the happy exchange they have made of war without trade for trade without war. Nay, sir, they are more robust than ever in opposition to the war, now that nothing is left in dispute but a canton of their own soil; and they venture to threaten us with disunion for presuming to enact a militia law, when the enemy offers us a peace we can accede to at any moment, and leave that section which shakes the rod of dismemberment over our heads to fight out the battle with Great Britain. Sir, I do not belong to that slaveholding portion of these States to which such frequent and such angry allusions are made from another quarter, and, for particular reasons, I look with a degree of reverence and a strong regard towards the East. I listen, too, with pleasure, generally, to whatever falls from the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. WEBSTER,) because, however I may disapprove the doctrine, it is, for the most part, supported by argument, as to-day it was by eloquence. But it was, if I may so express it, with a very painful pleasure that I attended to his pathetic threats this morning.

Mr. Chairman, a dissolution of this Confederacy is a national misfortune, upon which I never think without great pain. The political school in which I have made my inconsiderable acquisitions, abhors and deprecates so desperate a resort. I know of but one evil more to be dreaded. But there is one, and of that one I inform the gentleman from New Hampshire. It is the deterring those States who hold a legitimate ascendancy in the Government from any measure whatever, by the threat of a dismemberment as the consequence of it. Whenever this is the case, the Union is virtually dissolved. The substance is gone, and nothing remains but the shadow—a cold and melancholy shade of authority—without warmth, without life—contemptible to our enemies, and formidable only to ourselves. Minorities have their rights, and I should be one of the last to infringe upon them. But majorities have duties too, and duties to be performed at every hazard.

Sir, we have been but too long threatened with dissolution, but too often deterred from proper and Constitutional purposes by such apprehensions. The same ground was taken in the same quarter against the embargo laws. The same threats. But there was no resistance to those very severe and unpalatable acts; and I trust there will be none to this militia bill. I do not believe that there will. But whether there will or not shall have no influence upon me. If I consider the thing just, I shall vote for it and maintain it, leaving results to themselves. Is there nothing, sir, from the Potomac to the Penobscot but one vast sea of Administration? Is there no country left to embark upon? Have we no wrongs to avenge? No rights to assert? No enemy to contend with? No home to feel for? Or do gentlemen consider their country (to adopt a figure of Mr. Burke's) a carte blanche, on which they may scribble what they please. For my part, I rise to-day, Mr. Chairman, the advocate of no administration. I have taken the floor to assert the cause of my country against its foreign enemy; and I think the conjuncture has well nigh arrived when both Administration and Opposition may give way to nobler views than those of reviling and destroying each other. It is a fact, at once mortifying and alarming, that England is waging hostilities, not against your Union and resources, but against your divisions and prejudices. Reserving all my animosity for her, and anxious to defend our common cause, permit me cursorily to inquire whether it is really so low and so wretched as seems to be imagined. I am not disposed, I think it would be out of date at this time of day, to inquire into the wisdom of the declaration of war, which is besieged with such pertinacious and preposterous denunciation by almost every member of this House, who rises to oppose any measure now necessary for sustaining the contest in which we are involved. But this I will say, that I have no doubt, whenever the parties and passions of the moment shall be mellowed and melted down by the lapse of years and change of circumstances, that declaration will be recorded by the historian as the wisest and most fortunate act in the annals of America. I had not the honor of voting for the declaration of war—I wish I had. With a full and a keen sense of all the dangers and difficulties it has brought upon us, I would vote for it now were it again in question. Yes, sir, were we now in June, 1812, and had I the faculty to pierce the veil of futurity and discover all that has happened since, I would not hesitate. The venerable patriot whose mortal remains we lately consigned to the earth, (the Vice President, Mr. GERRY,) with the obsequies that became his services and his station, does not bequeath to his posterity a richer inheritance of public gratitude for the vote he gave for independence on the 4th of July, 1776, than will descend upon his children from any member of this Congress, who, from pure and patriotic considerations, (and I can suppose none other,) voted for the war on the 18th of June, 1812. It is true that we have experienced since then a great variety of fortunes, and that we are now arrived at a conjuncture big with portentous events. But to appreciate our situation properly, we should inquire not what it is or may be, but what it would and must have been if war had not been resorted to. What then would have been our condition? We might indeed have slumbered on through 1812 and 1813 in the protracted torpor of an ignominious peace. We might have still clung to a sorry remnant of the rags of trade. We might have remained in morbid neutrality, watching the phases of the moon in Europe. We might have witnessed those astonishing transactions there, which, crowding the business of centuries into the space of months, have overthrown the Colossus of the Continent, and bestrode his fallen carcass with that of the Colossus of the Seas. We might have hailed the ascendant star of England with a joy unmingled with apprehension, unadulterated with hostility. We might still have amused ourselves with furious factions and the war of words. Restrictive systems, and other such political polemics, would have never failed to separate us into unrelenting parties, just as we are marked off now. As to making preparation for hostilities under such circumstances, it is absurd to talk about it. And when the Spring came for our reanimation from this torpid, creeping, odious, miserable state, to what sort of vernal pleasures should we have risen up? With all the original causes of complaint existing, and aggravated, between you and England—for not one of them would have disappeared but from your demonstrations of resistance—without an officer or a soldier, a fortification or an equipment, distracted at home, despised abroad, you would have been cast upon the tender mercies and the magnanimity of Great Britain. And what has been your experience of those mercies, of that magnanimity? What claims have you beyond the Dutch, the Irish, the East Indian, or the Portuguese, to the forbearance and the fondness of your mother country? Has your Revolution left nothing? Or has your subsequent prosperity inflicted no pang? Holland, annexed to England, in return for the Dutch emancipation from the yoke of France, is the volume in which you may read your own fate. I refer gentlemen to an extract from the Leyden Gazette, lately published in our newspapers, by which it appears that not a Dutch vessel is to sail without a British license. And what right have we to be preferred to the Dutch? Instead of a question whether the Canadas should be annexed to the United States, there would have been no question as to the annexation of the United States to the Canadas. If a lady is to be found in this reprobate region worthy to be united in marriage with one of the worthies of the illustrious house of Brunswick, we should have been wedded to our ci-devant mother, with all the blessings of the incestuous Union. This, sir, is but a faint outline of the destiny of America, but for the attitude, the character, and the means of self-preservation, for all of which we are indebted to this war.

It is true, to be sure, that we have been consigned, almost without a thought from nations whose battles we are fighting, (particularly that one which offered its mediation) to the bloody and ferocious visitation of those modern Buccaneers, who have carried their calicoes for sale throughout the world at the point of the bayonet, plunging the bayonet into every bosom that refused to cover itself with the calico—who have wrapped the four corners of the earth in flames for a monopoly of manufactures. We could not dress but in their broadcloths. We could not eat but with their hardwares. We could not sleep but in their blankets. They had reduced us to Lord Chatham's wish. Not a hob-nail but was English. They had us effectually recolonized, without bloodshed or expense. But this did not content them. They must act the farcical tragedy which France performed with Spain. America belonged to England, in effect, as much as France belonged to Spain. But the goose must be killed that laid the golden egg. To this we demurred—we resisted. After a series of endurance and procrastination, to which I never can recur without shame and sorrow, we finally resisted. If we had begun the contest with the cause of it, it would have ended long ago, and ended to our honor. But we deferred it till the eve of a fundamental revolution of things in Europe, which, instead of turning European politics to our account, has left us England single-handed on our hands. We have accordingly suffered all that the combination of British power and British perfidy could inflict; no inconsiderable matter, sir—for British power, for the purposes of distant maritime aggression, is the most formidable in the world; and I defy all history, ancient as well as modern, sacred and profane, for parallels with British perfidy. We have endured invasion, prosecuted avowedly in defiance of the laws of civilized warfare. After sacking our Capital, the enemy, for the first time, I believe, that Christendom ever witnessed such an act, has proclaimed his purpose to ravage and destroy beyond the precincts of humanity. We have had warriors to contend with, whose first reinforcement was from the savage of your borders—whose last appeal was to the pirate lurking on our shores. All this we have undergone—the overcharged eruption from the volcano of British aggression. But we survive. The white heat of the fiery ordeal has subsided; and we find ourselves breathing again; with our union, our spirit, our resources, our territory; unsubdued, except the strip on the Penobscot—slowly, it must be confessed, but too slowly making preparation for another campaign. Never was stratagem more hollow, more perfidious, more cruel, more base than the overture last Winter by the Bramble—a stratagem against which this House will do me the justice to recollect that I then admonished them. Never was warfare more barbarous, more inhuman, more brutal, more unmanly than that waged against us by the English, pending the negotiation for peace, to which they gave the invitation. It has excited against them but one unanimous spirit of hearty detestation. An honorable gentleman of the other House (Mr. KING,) for whose person and character I shall always cherish the most affectionate regard, however I may differ from him in politics; who has not been distinguished by his dislike to England, has, within these few days, pronounced his eloquent and severe reprobation of their remorseless and sanguinary hostilities. Never were preliminaries of peace laid down upon a broader basis of stupid ignorance and infatuated misconception than those proposed by the British Commissioners at Ghent. Never was inflexible or supercilious superiority so soon relaxed—never was a peremptory sine qua non so soon commuted for a paltry ut possidetis. When gentlemen therefore labor by the good hour to prove to us how disastrous our affairs have been, I beg leave to commend them to the enemy for a contradiction. I request them to inform me how it happened, that mighty England has so soon descended from her towering height, unless she has found reasons in her reverses here, to moderate her tone there. She knows, she feels her disappointment. She recognises it in acts too strong to be argued out of existence by all the rhetoric and all the logic of this House. While her fleets, without a single occasion for their presence in any other quarter, have in vain attempted to maintain the paper blockade of our coast, our privateers have enforced an actual and absolute blockade of the coasts of Great Britain. While British ships-of-the-line have degraded the naval character by every species of vile exaction and dastardly mischief upon these shores, the American corsair has visited the shores of England with examples of heroism and humanity. The privateer has taught the man-of-war the lesson of his art—how to conquer and how to be generous. There are some vestiges, it must be acknowledged, of British conquest, but they are nowhere to be seen without the bloody print of British vandalism too. Even this Capitol presents a diurnal spectacle of mutilated columns and demolished monuments. But the blood of martyrs is the seed of the church; and every capital in Europe, which has survived unhurt the occupation of a conqueror, resounds with execration against the British barbarians who one day laid in ashes the Capital of America, and the next day fled to their ships, leaving their wounded to the mercy of those whom they had thus alienated from the feelings of humanity.

But Canada has not been conquered; and my friend from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) has been reminded of his prediction, that it would be. To all the purposes of that prediction, Canada has been conquered. It was not that we desired to magnify our Republic by adding the Canadas to the Confederacy. If the inhabitants could be removed, I should not care, for my part, if Canada could be overflowed by the ocean. But as a means of obtaining peace, and not as the end of the war, the conquest of the Canadas has been almost achieved. And for this again I beg leave to refer to Ghent and England. We have performed a campaign on Canadian ground which is worth the acquisition of ten thousand Canadas. We have accomplished officers, and that being done, England knows that we can create soldiers. The American in Europe need now no longer blush to be an American. The European who visits America—after traversing the ocean, every latitude of which is in a blaze with the naval glories of our glorious tars—and who repairs to the Falls of Niagara, as the most prodigious of nature's wonders, will find every species of classic recollection superadded to the natural prodigy of the scene. The grounds round the Falls of Niagara are all sanctified with romantic exploits and brilliant achievements—achievements which have plucked the military as well as the naval plume from British brows—which have been followed by the congratulations and applause of the whole American people. Whether the campaign has been well or ill conducted, on the part of the Administration, I cannot stop to inquire. Whether General Izard ought to have been here and General Brown there, or what share the Administration should have of credit or censure for these operations, I neither know nor care. It answers all my purposes that they redound to the honor of the country—that they enhance the American name at the expense of the enemy of America—the rest is matter of controversy with which I cannot disturb my feelings.

Our ministers in Europe may now with honest pride and independence declare to those potentates who shrunk from our assistance, though our cause was theirs, because they dared not aid us—We have triumphed without your reinforcement, ay, without even your countenance, we have vanquished the victors of your conquerors. We do not ask your alliance. We do not stand in need of it. With the blessing of God, and our means, we can do without it. All that we ask of you is, to cause your neutral rights to be respected as we have caused ours to be. Learn from our example how strong a good cause renders the weak against the mighty. Betrayed by inordinate love of peace and the infamous double dealing of England into but partial preparation for war, we were overtaken unawares by fearful odds. You thought, no doubt, that the chances were against us. But, after a whole campaign of our infernal enemy's utmost scope, not a wreath of laurel have we lost nor an inch of ground, excepting a small part which was not defended as it should have been. My life upon it, sir, the magnanimous Alexander will find that his esteem for us is greater than he supposed it; and Louis the Desired, in 1815, like his predecessor in 1778, will generously press in with his assistance, since he perceives that we can do without it.

But we must have armies, and we must have money. I venture to assert, that the mere enactment, by something like unanimity in this House, of a good military system, with indications of acquiescence in it out of doors, would secure us a peace forthwith, without the necessity of enforcing the system. I appeal to those gentlemen, who are so clamorous for peace, to coalesce for an object so desirable. That system, in my opinion, is a classification of the white male population of the country for the purpose of a draught into the regular armies. You may call it by what odious ugly name you will—conscription or what not—but it is the only sufficient, the only republican, the only fair, the only equal plan for applying the physical means to the end of common military defence and protection. Sir, vast improvements have taken place in the military art since the last twenty years. All Europe has in effect adopted these improvements; and this country will be left lamentably behind in the march of mankind, unless, like the rest, it adopts them too. What are they, sir? Simply a return to the great cardinal principles of republican Government—to the principles which maintained Rome for so many centuries on the ascendant, and again for so many centuries on the decline, before her mere declension disappeared in the darkness of the middle ages. The gentleman from New York (Mr. MILLER) was mistaken in supposing that the Militia Romanorum admitted of either alternative or exemption. There was no such thing. Every citizen was in fact a soldier. Every citizen was compelled to serve his country under arms, and no citizen was permitted to be elevated to civil honor who had not served them in the military field. It is some time, sir, since I read Polybius; and Washington is not the best place on earth for reference to books. But unless I am quite wrong in my remembrance, the gentleman from New York will find, in the 7th book of that work, the Roman system as I have stated it. But it is somewhat scholastic to refer to such authorities. Let us come down to the later times. We all know the military tenures, the scutage, the knight service, &c., by which the vassal was bound to serve his lord, his lord the duke, and the duke his sovereign. We know the base and arriere law, which used to carry men into the field for short and insufficient terms of service. We read, at still more recent periods, of the Condottieri, the Hessians, the Walloons, the various mercenaries, which for the most part composed the armies of Europe. We know that the great Frederick fought his famous seven years' war with troops of this description. But these again may be thrown out of view, together with the Roman precedent. I invite gentlemen to accompany me to England for a conscription, and I pledge myself to find them one of the harshest and most unequal kind—not impressment for the sea, but conscription for the land service. I invite, particularly, the attention of the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. WEBSTER) to the book I am about to read from—it is the English Statutes at Large—a treatise with which his pursuits ought to make him peculiarly conversant. Here, where there are no naughty assignats nor Napoleons; here, in this adorable land of liberty and wisdom, here we shall find conscription at full length.

[Mr. INGERSOLL then read several sections of an act of Parliament for recruiting the regular army, enacted in 1756, and to be found in the 7th volume of the English Statutes at Large, page

625, 28 G., 2 c. 4; and from another act, enacted in 1757, to be found in the 8th volume of these Statutes, page 11, 30 G., 2, c. 8.]

Thus, sir, it appears that Lord Chatham planned and Wolfe executed a precedent for Bonaparte's conscriptive system. Here we find that all persons without employment are to be draughted into the King's service. For how long? Five years! From what ages? From seventeen to forty-five. For how much? For forty shillings a head. By what means? By seizing on their persons, and throwing them into confinement till the recruiting sergeant was ready to receive their translation to the ranks. And who were intended by her sons out of employment? The yeomanry of the country. How does this appear? Most conclusively from that section which excepts them in the time of harvest. It was not the loungers, the gentleman, the man of fortune, the cockney, that Lord Chatham laid hold of as a person without employment. Oh, no! his lordship knew better. He has left, to be sure, the impression of the energies of his character and administration upon this act of Parliament. But he had not the jacobin temerity to meddle with the privileged orders; that was reserved for the Corsican, who, with his own scymitar, cut his own way to a throne; and who, with all the vulgar prejudices of his former situation, devised and executed a scheme for making gentlemen serve their country just like common people. Oh, the monster! The yeoman, whom Lord Chatham forced into General Wolfe's army, had no friend at court. Like the ten thousand American seamen in British ships, he might have writhed in anguish till the flesh rotted from his bones, without an advocate to assert his claims, unless the merchant had become a sufferer too, and clamored his country into a war against Orders in Council. Lord Chatham violated only the sanctuary of the cottage. But Napoleon intruded on the palace.

And for what war, in particular, was it that this act of Parliament raised men by conscription? For the conquest of Canada. Chatham was the minister, and Wolfe the commander—names dear to England—illustrious and venerable names. I subscribe to the sentiments, and quote the language of a modern poet, that it is—

To fill the ambition of a private man,
That Chatham's language was his mother tongue,

Thus it appears, Mr. Chairman, that Napoleon had a precedent, an English precedent, for his conscription. To argue the objections to this system, from its abuse by the late French Emperor, is a false mode of argument. He did abuse the engine, to the most extensive, and wanton, and abominable ends. But it does by no means follow, therefore, that the system itself is a bad one.

Have we no American great name associated with this system, which seems to excite at once all the Gog and Magog terrors, that one would think ought by this time to be banished to the

DECEMBER, 1814.

Militia Draughts.

H. OF R.

Island of Elba? We have, sir, a name never mentioned but with reverence; never uttered by the tongue without a glow of the heart. General WASHINGTON, after remonstrating for three or four years in vain against militia and short enlistments, was constrained at last to have recourse to classification and draught; and our liberties were ultimately gained by American conscripts. Not, indeed, until our towns were occupied and sacked, our shores in flames, and our prejudices subdued by our stronger feelings—a course of discipline which I am afraid will again be necessary. Our strong measures are almost always reserved for the next year after the occasion for them.

We have ascertained that neither militia nor voluntary enlistments are to be relied upon. The fatal doctrine of citizen-soldier (as we adhere to it) has cost us more money, more blood, more mourning, in six months, than a war of six years should or would cost under proper military organization. For proof of this, go to the camp at Ellicott's Mills, in this neighborhood; see every fourth man on his sick bed, or rather sick without a bed to lie upon; every day a funeral; count the cost; estimate the expense of actual disbursement and of loss of labor, and no rational, no feeling man can doubt as to the shocking inexpediency of such a system. I appeal to the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BRECKENRIDGE) for the correctness of what I say. With such dreadful scenes of preparation for service, let me refer the Committee to a still nearer and still more painful scene, for the inefficiency of militia. I mean the affair at Bladensburg. In making this reference, I beg leave to be understood as intending to blame nobody, from the General down to the private. It always has been, and always will be, impossible with militia to contend with regulars. It takes seven years apprenticeship to make a tinker or a tailor; and is it to be conceived that the military science is to be acquired by intuition?

Such are the militiamen, and what are they, obtained by what is termed voluntary enlistment? Go to the recruiting rendezvous for information. A poor ignorant creature is cajoled into the dram-shop, and betrayed into intoxication; when his senses are gone, the Evangelists are put into his hands, and he is called upon to invoke the Almighty to witness his engagement to serve his country; a bounty is thrust into his pocket; a cap is put upon his head, and he becomes a soldier. When the fit of drunkenness goes off, he is informed of his enlistment; he denies it; he is manacled; he resists; he is confined, until finally he is subdued into voluntary enlistment. Let me not be asked why I support a war which involves these evils. I answer, that war is itself an evil, but a necessary one. Whereas these disgusting practices may be easily avoided. They are one of our English legacies. Recruiting is a brutal exercise of violence and fraud over mental alienation. It is an image of the bastard liberty of England. It is slavery called liberty.

The substitute for it is the most simple, the most republican, the most equal and unexceptionable system in the world—that of militia classification and draught. That is, militia as it should be, not as it is. Of all countries in the world, this is the one best adapted to such a system. It is here, alone, that all men are treated as equals. By this, I do not mean any revolutionary equality. No; education, and even wealth, place their possessors above the illiterate and the indigent. In spite of all they do, fortune will make her own selections, and laws cannot control them. The most powerful and consistent argument extant in favor of republicanism, is to be found in the New Testament; but, at the same time, the most positive authority for the gradation of the social order. For, as the great republican poet has expressed it, "orders and degrees jar not with liberty, but well consist." But, then, it should be the constant endeavor of Government to maintain a perfect equality in all civil enjoyments and impositions; to burden the poor with nothing that does not fall likewise on the rich; to call upon the latter according to their opulence for pecuniary aid; and not to call upon the former for any personal services that are not exacted of all alike. Upon these principles emphatically does that military system rest, which, by whatever title denominated, classifies a population and compels them to serve without exemption or reservation.

As to the constitutionality of this measure, I refuse to argue it. I hold it to be too clear for argument. Independent of the explicit terms of the Constitution, this power is inherent in the nature of Government. Its exercise and extent must be referred for their regulation to a sound discretion. I adopt the sentiment of the chairman of the Military Committee, (Mr. TROUP,) that the Constitution authorizes it, and that, if it does not, such a Constitution is not worth regarding or having.

That it would be popular, (I mean in the legitimate acceptance of popularity, agreeable to the people at large,) I have no doubt, because it calls upon them for no duty that is not necessary and common to all. And the people never murmur at such calls. In that portion of the country with which I have any acquaintance, I am sure it has been expected from Congress, and would be received with pleasure, as the best alternative for the oppressive militia functions. Whether it would be odious or resisted, as is threatened elsewhere, is not for me to determine. I can tell the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. WEBSTER,) however, that the glowing picture he has drawn of its effects is but faintly shadowed to that which this country will present, unless some energetic and adequate system be enforced. The late developments from Europe place us, sir, upon critical ground. On one side, all is peace, prosperity, renown, and respect. On the other, war interminable, disunion, devastation, disgrace, and irretrievable ruin. Dismemberment would be but a little misfortune, contrasted with what may be our lot, unless we rise up to the exigency. The dangers of despotism which are imagined, are alarming; it must be confessed; but they are not so awful as the degradation and misery which may result from a fear to do what our position demands. Convulsion is no more to be dreaded than paralysis. For myself, I see no peril but in our own divisions. The Republic is perfectly safe, if we pursue those energetic and powerful measures which alone can save us—which alone are consistent with our duty, and commensurate with the occasion.

Mr. SHIPPERD addressed the Chair as follows :

Mr. Chairman, should it be my good fortune to secure the attention of the Committee, I shall submit a few humble remarks upon the interesting question which is under consideration. One more so, has rarely, in my opinion, if ever occupied the deliberation of Congress. All that is dear to freedom, hangs upon the decision—in forming which we must say to our fellow-citizens, henceforth be ye slaves; relinquish that blood-bought freedom for which your fathers fought, or still enjoy ye its blessings. We are to say, sir, whether they shall be dragged forth to die in the camp, or be slaughtered in the field, or still enjoy the comforts of domestic life with its pursuits and emoluments. Whether, in obedience to the awful mandate of despotic power, they must be forced from the protection of civil to the rigours of military law—marched from all the heart holds dear, this side the grave, to encounter the perils, hardships, and privations of war, or still reposing in security under the shadow of an unviolated Constitution, present the heartfelt offering of thanks to Heaven for liberty and protection.

On a question of such moment, we ought to proceed with the utmost caution, taking good care that we do not lose forever the most valued blessings of life, by the indulgence of a mistaken zeal to prosecute with effect an unhappy war. Yes, sir, before we adopt a measure so new and extraordinary, one which must strike at the vitals of civil liberty, we are admonished by every serious consideration to investigate with all our skill, and then say whether, by passing the bill before you, we do not overleap the bounds of our authority, and tread on forbidden ground. I believe, sir, we should do so, and therefore it is a sacred duty with me to protest against the measure. If you are determined to dig the grave of your country's freedom, when the awful deed is done, you shall not be left the excuse to say to an accusing conscience, "I was not warned of the rash step before it was too late to retrieve it." No, sir, not even this slender consolation will be permitted us, if, in defiance of the soundest principles of the Government, we shall strip from our countrymen the shield of their liberties.

The member impressed with this belief, would prove a coward in his duty, if, in dread of the frowns of a majority, he should barter the rewards growing out of the exercise of honest convictions for indemnity against their resentments.

Much, sir, has been said, which related more to the measures of Administration generally, than the particular topic presented by the motion of my honorable friend and colleague (Mr. MILLER,) which in my mind is, first: whether Congress have a Constitutional right to pass the bill? If so, then, secondly, whether the interest of the country demands the exercise of a power so extraordinary? I propose, Mr. Chairman, to examine these two points.

The inquiry then, sir, is, first, does the Constitution delegate to Congress the right to make laws coercing the citizens of the Union into the armies thereof? If it does not, our legislating on this subject must cease, for whatever may be the necessity of a measure which cannot be adopted without an usurpation of power, an infringement of the Constitution, that necessity must give place to the more imposing duty of keeping within its limits. In other words, unless the Constitution has expressly given the power to the Legislature to fill the ranks of our armies or create new armies by compulsion, it is useless to debate about the convenience, importance, or even necessity of the measure. For unless authority is expressly given or derived by fair implication, we have no right whatever to pass the bill. All the powers which are not expressly delegated to the General Government are expressly reserved to the States. What, then, sir, are expressly given to the General Government in relation to this subject: they are two—

1. To provide the calling out the militia.
2. To raise armies.

I had hoped, sir, that the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. DUVAL,) whose talents I respect, and which certainly entitle him to a high stand in this House, would have shown us in what particular the Constitution gives us the authority contended for on this side of the question; but hope was vain, "he passed by on the other side." Is it not fair, then, sir, to say, if talents such as his avoided the support of a favorite topic, that it cannot be supported? He ingeniously led off the Committee by complaining of the eccentric course of my honorable friend, (Mr. MILLER,) and in order to surround him, as he pretended, took the liberty of a far more extensive route.

Another question, sir, has been debated between gentlemen on my left, and was it not that I hope to prove them both wrong, it would be passed without notice, because to me it is most evident that whether the one or the other is right they are both wrong. The question is, whether the troops to be called or rather forced out in pursuance of the bill before you are regulars or militia.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GHOLSON) pronounced them of the former, and, therefore, he would infer that Congress have a right to work up citizens into regular soldiers. But his friend from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) adhered to the title of the bill, and named them the latter, and thence inferred that we have power to compel them to serve as militiamen, whatever may be the time or conditions of service. Here, sir, you perceive we have different commentaries from gentlemen of the same creed upon the same text, and for the purpose of supporting the proposition laid down, that we have no Constitutional right to pass this bill, it is a point of no importance whether they are militia or regulars, the consequence deduced by the gentlemen will not follow, whether these or those are the premises. I shall, therefore, leave the gentlemen to settle the question and proceed, as mentioned, to show them both wrong.

1st. Then, sir, admit the title of the bill to be correct, which most certainly is not, for the sake of the argument, I will search the Constitution and endeavor to show that we have no power to pass the bill.

The Constitution authorizes Congress to provide for calling out the militia; in what cases, sir? Only for the purposes of—

1st. To execute the laws of the Union.

2d. To repel invasion; and

3d. To suppress insurrection.

If, therefore, Mr. Chairman, the bill on your table is to accomplish either of these objects, then no doubt can exist of a Constitutional right to make it a law.

It is somewhere said the prosecuting an offensive or defensive war is executing the law, and therefore the militia may be called out to aid in the one or the other; but this must be an interpretation of meaning so weak and absurd that it never can be adopted as sound.

The meaning is too obvious to be doubted; that this power was given to the civil magistrate in executing the municipal law, carrying into effect the sentences of courts of judicature, and to aid in the civil or criminal process, in cases of resistance, and has not the most distant allusion to raising an invading or opposing army. If this be the true construction of this clause, your laws, sir, are already sufficient, not only for this, but the other two cases: namely, to suppress insurrection, and repel invasion. Congress has already provided amply for the exigency of the three cases, and there can be no necessity of auxiliary laws.

But most evidently neither of these objects was the motive which induced the framing this monster. There is a design of horrid import beyond this. No one has, no one will deny it. And a specious purpose is avowed in the title of the bill to conceal the occult object. Canada must be taken, said a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Gholson,) and to take Canada are these militia, regulars, or mongrels, to be dragged to the camps, to battle and slaughter.

Sir, you may call out the militia to repel invasion. But you cannot call them out for two years, or one, for a month, a day, or even an hour, unless the country is invaded; you have no right to anticipate the invasion, it must exist, in fact, or the Constitution does not reach the case. Is your country invaded? Be it so; then under already existing laws, the President can call for the militia; but I deny, sir, that Congress have a right to make laws calling out the militia for a definite period, however short.

It is most obvious from the wording of the Constitution, the militia were designed as a specific for enumerated evils, and in no other case has the General Government power to command them. Will any honorable gentleman risk the charge of absurdity by contending that the Government have a right to the remedy, although the evil does not exist. And it seems equally absurd to contend that they may be used as a remedy for other evils than those enumerated. The States had an exclusive right to the militia; and in forming the compact and delegating powers to the General Government, they say we will permit you to call for our militia in three cases, namely, when your officers cannot execute your laws; when any of your citizens rise in arms against you, or when an enemy shall invade your frontier. This is the utmost extent of the power granted, and can it possibly follow from this grant, that, in expectation of the enumerated cases, the General Government have a right to call the militia to camp in waiting for an event which may or may not happen. If it does, the limitation, or rather the enumeration of distinct cases to define the authority of the General Government is ridiculous, because it must be useless; and adopting this Constitution, we are to suppose the wise men who framed the Constitution filled it up with unmeaning and useless sentences to make it of sufficient length. For, if this is the construction, your powers are not limited at all; they are general, and it is only to say, we expect a case mentioned. Therefore, we exercise our prerogatives, and lead the militia to the camp. For how long? as long as we please, for months, years, or for life, at our election. This would be the consequence of the doctrine; and this, at one blow, might break down the State sovereignties—rob them of their highest and most valued prerogatives. If this right really exists in Congress, the citizens and State governments have no shield against their power; it will be only necessary to wave its rod, like a magic wand, and the citizens, in greater or less numbers, are instantly metamorphosed, and become soldiers. Absolute authority may be exercised over their liberties and occupations, and at once they cease to be freemen, and become slaves.

But, sir, if you adopt the construction contended for on this side, you are again free. You at once perceive a meaning, a glorious object congenial with, and a sure protector of liberty, in the specification of cases for the General Government. It surrounds the citizen with an impregnable barrier against the encroachments of ambition; it defines his rights and duties, and marks the line between legitimate power and despotism.

Destroy this limitation, and what becomes of the State sovereignties? Impotent must be their laws without the means of executing them. The respect secured thereby must be held on the precarious tenure of the friendly disposition of the General Government. A tenure at this time precarious indeed. Sir, we should much dislike a dependence of this kind; let us keep our State governments on the old ground, "by the grace of God free and independent." You will gain nothing by swallowing us; we shall disturb and sicken you within, and compel you, like Jonah's whale, to throw us up.

This construction of the Constitution is suited to the notions entertained at its adoption. I mean the jealousies which were cherished by the States, and which were so strong towards the General Government as to threaten the rejection of that instrument. These jealousies not only exist in history, but in the recollection of thousands, indeed, in the very paper itself and its amendments. Why does it reserve to the States all powers which are not expressly delegated, but from the caution just mentioned? If the States were willing to intrust the Government of the Union with absolute dominion over their liberties, property, and other privileges, tell me why all those checks and restraints are imposed upon your National Legislature? Now, sir, if we find the Constitution framed with so much caution, avoiding any oppugnation of the essential principles of State sovereignty, can any discreet man believe that the States which had won their independence by the dint of their own sovereign arms, merely advised by Congress, and tremblingly alive to their interests, fearing lest the new Government should curtail their prerogatives, reserving all powers not delegated, should without any limitation give up to the absolute control of the General Government their whole militia, and at once divest themselves of their sovereignty? For only deprive a Government of armed force sufficient to carry into effect its laws, and what remains can neither command respect or enforce obedience.

If, sir, you are left without any Constitutional restraints in relation to this subject, or to be more explicit, if you have a right to pass this bill, the Government is a despotism. You may exercise absolute power over the liberty of the citizen, and whether exercised by one or many, does not alter its nature. The principles and not the number of men who make laws or pass edicts constitutes the free or despotic nature of the Government. One man may make a people free and happy, while an hundred may enslave them. You therefore perceive, sir, if we hold this power in our hands, we are intrusted with a dangerous power, totally irreconcilable with the idea of the freedom of our Government and habits; totally inconsistent with that security of the political blessings which has been boasted of, experienced, and appreciated—a power which the Mother Country, whose tyranny we could not endure, never pretended to possess, and dare not exercise.

It is true, sir, that this bill may be created without passing the limits of the Constitution. We had better tear in pieces an instrument which affords so little security to our citizens. Why shackle Congress with any restraints, if they are left free to trample on the most sacred rights of freemen? It only marks us with a name and shadow, while the substance is entirely the reverse.

If the power to pass this law is delegated to or exists in Congress, see, sir, what may be its fruits! It is not confined to a time of war; but in peace, as well as war, might your citizens be subjected to a military life. You might treat them as you do your slaves—compel them to toil and drudge at your pleasure. For, sir, if you take away the limitation which we say bounds your power, there is none left, and it is purely a matter of discretion in Congress whether our fellow-citizens may control their own pursuits, recreations, pleasures, enjoyments, and employments; or whether we (their masters) shall ease them of that trouble, and place them under military government, regimen, and discipline—subjugate them to the care of a sergeant or sabre of a subaltern. This, sir, would be the evil as it respects the right at any time, and all times, to control the citizen. But, this is not all. If it does exist, it enables Congress not only to call at any time, but on anybody. It may be as unrelenting as death, and like him take all ranks, ages, and classes, of men—the minister from the altar of his God; the judge from the bench of justice; the lawyer from the bar; the merchant from his counting-room; the physician from the sick-bed of his patient; the farmer from his field; and the mechanic from his workshop. Whenever you may please to exercise this high, dangerous, unlimited prerogative, you tear away whoever you please from their homes and employments, and, without exemption or distinction, devote them to the horrors, filth, and vermin, of a camp. This tremendous power would not be compelled to spare the decrepitude of old age or tenderness of youth. And do we live under such a Government, Mr. Chairman? If we do, let us instantly change it before our strength is taken away and our chains rivetted. Do you call that Government free, sir, that does not stand sentinel over the freedom of the ground; that places no limits but discretion to the power of the governors? It is said, this discretion will not be abused: the limitation, therefore, is unnecessary. Congress, governed by a just sense of the solemn duties imposed upon them, will never oppress the citizen.

Sir, Congress is composed of men liable to err, and fallible, like other men, whose passions may predominate over their reason; whose lust of power may control their love of justice.

If the militia, sir, are the mere creatures of the General Government, as contended for by gentlemen, why, let me ask, was the right to appoint their officers reserved to the States? It would be strange, if they were wholly devoted to the Union, that such an essential principle should have been reserved.

"Congress may provide for organizing and arming the militia." Yes, sir, but does it follow from this provision that they have a right to call them to the field? Certainly not. The object of this clause most evidently was to promote uniformity in their arms, exercise, and discipline; that if at any time they were called into the field, they could the better act in unison.

Having, Mr. Chairman, as far as I have been able, and to the unbiassed mind, I trust, sufficiently proved, that the General Government have no control over the militia of the Union, for the objects contemplated in this bill, I will make a few remarks to show their want of power to coerce the citizens of this country to become regular soldiers.

DECEMBER, 1814.

Militia Draughts.

H. OF R.

I am constrained to say, with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GHOLSON,) that the army intended to be raised by virtue of this act would not be militia, but regular soldiers. Adopting this as true, can they, as such, be changed from citizens into soldiers? It really seems that some gentlemen think so, for attempts have been made to prove it by citing the clause of the Constitution which gives power to Congress to raise armies. This power is given without doubt. The only question remains to determine the mode; and as it respects that, the gentleman will find their Constitution to fail them. How shall they raise armies? is the inquiry. All is silent. It then follows most irresistibly, that they are to be raised agreeably to the usages of free countries, controlled by a scrupulous regard to the dearest interests of the nation, by and only by voluntary enlistment. Great Britain, whose tyranny we could not endure, raises her armies in this way. She neither dare to enact, nor could she execute, a law forcing the subject into the regular army. The employing men to become soldiers is done in the same way as the employing them to become laborers, by contract. Such must be the meaning of the Constitution—adopt any other meaning, and the charter of liberty becomes an instrument of tyranny; you give to it attributes which are inadmissible even in idea. The Constitution itself declares the Government therein described to be free. Such is its character; no construction therefore of any part of it ought ever to be tolerated for a moment, incompatible with freedom. I beseech gentlemen, therefore, not to indulge in experiments diametrically opposed to the most sacred principles of liberty.

It is most evident that such is the construction, and was so intended by the framers of that instrument. If not, see with what absurdity they must have acted. In the first place they limit the powers of the General Government over the citizen as a militiaman, and expose him to an unlimited power, when called by another name, to wit: a regular soldier; and the doctrine contended for goes still further. You have not only the ordinary powers over him after he has become such, but you have a right to make him a regular soldier; by a sort of magic process, to cause all ranks, employments, and ages of citizens to undergo the instantaneous and wonderful mutations of enchantment—transferring the judge if you please from his honorable seat to the glories derived from the regions of blasphemy, drunkenness, and pollution. If, sir, it was intended to surround the militia with a Constitutional guard, how much stronger was the reason for the like or more effectual guard for the citizen, to prevent his being forced to become a regular soldier! The reason is as much stronger in the latter than the former case, as the services and sufferings of the latter are more irksome and severe. The reasoning of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr.

GHOLSON) must be fallacious. The amount of it is, you, citizen, are exempted from involuntary service, unless in the three cases mentioned in the Constitution, as one enrolled in the militia; but the Government can get at you under another name, and doom you to any service they please.

This is, truly, a strange doctrine to advance, in giving meaning to the Constitution of a country. Giving the name all efficacy, and the object named none at all. What consolation will it be, sir, to the wretched man, torn by the ruthless hand of power from the bosom of a wife and family he adores, while his heart swims in the tears of anguish, to be told by the ruffian who comes to snatch him from all his soul values on earth, that his rights are not violated in the capacity of a militiaman, but as a regular soldier! In Governments it is the substance of things which ought, and with wise and good politicians does control their measures. Regardless of names they will look to effects, and not mock the sufferer by telling him this or that horrid and cruel measure is called by this and not that name. Will the victim of your oppressive measures, with heart bleeding and eyes weeping, feel the one stanching and the other dried, should you tell him, "comfort yourself my friend, you are not going to be butchered in the capacity of a militiaman, but only as a regular soldier?" Why, sir, was you to say so, you would soon see mingled with the tear of sorrow the smile of contempt, and low as he would feel himself sunk, in his soul he would despise the idiot whose contemptible intellects could stoop to a remark so mean and pitiful.

If this doctrine is correct, what are the benefits resulting from the limitations of power in Congress? Certainly none. It is shielding the limbs and leaving the vitals exposed to the darts of despotism; and can you, can any man believe that the people in their cool moments, deliberating with care, feeling no warmth but zeal for the best interests of their country, could have been guilty of such inconsistency, or weak enough to have overlooked it? Tell it not; believe it not. It cannot be so. Let us not thus slander the hearts or heads of the sainted men, who travailed with this precious instrument until a joyful reckoning was run, and the people hailed its birth as a millennial epoch. However we may act, whether consistently or otherwise, let us not reproach their memories or names.

Turn the subject over as often as you please, torture it to your purpose, it amounts to no more or less than this: "As a white man, the law protects A B—presume not to touch him; but if you call him an Indian, by the same law you have a perfect right to kill him."

I will now, Mr. Chairman, ask the attention of the Committee to the second point, which is the expediency of this measure, provided no Constitutional scruples existed. And it appears to me perfectly demonstrable, if the power existed in Congress, it would be inexpedient, indeed it would be hazardous, to attempt the exercise of it. Remember, sir, that your people have ever been, and ever will be free. Remember that they possess a keen, but laudable jealousy in respect to their rights; that the power is in their hands; they delegate it when and to whom they please, and they never will submit to any extensive encroachments upon their privileges. Wisdom, therefore, most unquestionably dictates to the legislator, that, while he legislates agreeable to his conscience, to please those whom he binds by his laws, is an object of no trifling importance. And, sir, there can be but little necessity of our adopting measures which the people will dislike; if there is, it must have originated in previous misconduct. The majority of the people may, and sometimes by falsehood have, been misled; but left to draw their own conclusions from correct information, they will be right. In the grand community there is much of the best of all sense, common; the best of all knowledge, practical; and by those standards they will condemn or approve, as bad or good measures shall be adopted. If I am correct, how stands your war? Do the people approve of it? We were told they do. That it is the people's war, that they declared it; if so, what necessity can there be of forcing the people into your armies? It must be strange that they approved, nay, declared the war, and yet nothing short of coercion will fill the ranks of your legions. "It is strange, passing strange," that the people will not support a measure of their own devising and creating unless whipped into their duty.

That they refuse, and have refused, is most manifest, for while with one breath we are told the war is popular, with the next we are also told that every attempt to awaken the patriotism or the cupidity of the people has fallen far behind the high expectations entertained before the experiments were made. Now, sir, it is most certain that if the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. DUVAL) is correct, you can have no necessity of exercising powers so unusual, so abhorrent, and so unjust and dangerous, to accomplish your object. If they love your war, they will love to support it, and will devote their services and blood to the cause, and consequently there can be no need of force. And it will be inexpedient and imprudent to pass the bill, for if the people now love you, there is at least some risk of losing their affections by a measure not of the most inviting complexion. But suppose the honorable gentleman should be mistaken, which to me is most probable, can you be so credulous as to believe that an army forced from a comfortable home, with its delights and conveniences, to the miseries of a camp, will cheerfully expose their lives, and shed their blood in defence of a Government which had proved by its measures to be their greatest enemy? No; as they loved their liberty, as they loved that proud independence, won by the blood of their fathers, they would turn upon you to rend the sceptre of ill-gotten power from unworthy hands. Confide not, sir, in such an army; if you do, disappointment awaits you. Bear in mind that our countrymen are free Americans, not Frenchmen, and they will not submit to chains. If the people do not like your measures, I will not say what some gentlemen have boldly said, that they would resist, and they hoped they would, but I have a right to exercise a natural privilege; I have a right to guess, and I guess they will resist in all the majesty of insulted freedom; and if they do, like a mighty tornado, or overwhelming torrent, they will sweep away every opposing object. I therefore entreat gentlemen to beware what they do; to be cautious how they enkindle a flame they will not be able to extinguish.

Sir, I do not believe the war was ever popular; I verily believe the people detested it from the beginning, and the wretched manner in which it has been prosecuted has increased that detestation; it needs only the passage of this bill, and but an attempt to execute it, to give the finishing blow that will sever all honest hearts from the Government and its war.

Do you flatter yourself, sir, that the people will submit to the execution of a law which is composed of more baleful materials, more cursed ingredients, and may produce more miseries than all that have been felt in the aggregate, under the British Government and our own? Think you, sir, that the people will tamely behold the widowhood and orphanage of their friends and neighbors, the result of your law? I say so because the tracks are nearly all one way. If the father, the son, the husband, or brother, goes out in pursuance of this mandate, he probably goes to die; disease or battle gives him shortly a termination to his sufferings in this world.

But, Mr. Chairman, admit that you can carry this law into effect, and that, too, without opposition by force, are you willing to do so great injustice to your fellow-citizens? Surely, sir, you must feel some compassion for them, some sense of what is right. As an apology on this part of the subject, it was said by a gentleman, the citizen is not obliged to serve unless he pleases. He has only to pay the penalty and exonerate himself. Sir, need the honorable gentleman be told that a vast portion of the population of our country are altogether unable to satisfy the requisition of the law in this respect? To such a person there is no alternative. The lot falls on such a man—the father of a numerous family, whose patient labor gives them bread; he must go, and his family left wretched and forlorn. Now, sir, is all this right? Let me ask, with an emphasis, is it right? If you expect success to follow such measures; measures, which blight and wither our present joys and sicken all hopes of the future, you must have cherished a delusion, for nothing less could create expectations wholly destitute of foundation. If we are to be slaves, why are we told we must defend ourselves against an invading enemy? We were once the subjects of that enemy, and, as I have said, they never did, nor ever dared to pass a law as odious as the bill on your table; but I have no fancy to be conquered by that enemy. I know my brave countrymen, or that portion of them which have minds to devise, courage to dare, and strength to execute, what their rights require in the field, and speak it with pleasure, they are not to be conquered.

H. OF R.

They have lived free, and will die so; and they will not thank you to violate the Constitution they love, and impugn the freedom they adore, under pretence of defending them. No, sir, do not take this rash step; better let them, if you cannot enlist men, defend themselves. Let them manage their own matters in their own way. This is the least you can do. Let the people alone; for this they might thank you, but not for exercising a usurped authority which threatens to enslave them.

The gentleman from Kentucky seemed to chide my honorable colleague (Mr. MILLER) for calling this measure a conscription. He says it is not so. Well, sir, although the name conscription "freezes the blood and chills the mortal frame;" although it carries in the sound every horrible thought that can fix on the heart the cold shuddering of approaching death; yet no greater evils would follow in its train, had its title been "an act of conscription," than the present title, "to provide for calling out the militia." The name of this, as of all other measures, is but of little importance; and call this bill what you please, it still will retain all the odious provisions that it now does.

Again, sir, have we been solicited to unite with the majority, and as a motive, the melancholy state of our country has been pathetically described; this description is too true to be doubted, and it is an alarming truth. This great fabric seems nodding and tottering to its fall, and Heaven only knows how long before the mighty ruin will take place. But, sir, this state of things, so far from being a motive to induce a union, on the ground to which we are invited, loudly admonishes us to avoid it. The gentlemen have ruined the country by a class of measures, and now, to restore it, they invite us to join in continuing the same. No, sir, we should do injustice even to them to do so, as we certainly act the most friendly part to them and our country, when we oppose and are able to impede them in the career of ruin. If they wish to lay aside party, reason dictates, as they have acknowledged their inability to manage the political concerns of the nation, that they should abandon their ground, and take one which WASHINGTON explored—adopt his principles, and the gentlemen will not need to give us a second invitation to union. Most willingly, sir, would we receive with brotherly good-will, those who, sensible of error, expressed, by abandoning it, their dispositions to adopt another and a better course. That we are right, amounts to almost mathematical certainty; for, whatever opposes wrong is right, and we have been accused of systematic opposition to the men in power, to their measures; and who among them will venture to deny that those measures have been wrong? Should we, then, give up our justifiable opposition, we should only add to the number of hands employed in the total destruction of this once happy country? No, sir, excuse us, we cannot go over; we are a little band, it is true, but, like that little band who valiantly braved a formidable opposition at the straits of Thermopylae, we still design to stand between the enemy and irretrievable ruin; and faint as are our hopes, yet we know nothing of abandoning our duty or principle; we hold out to the last, and fall when all fall.

Sir, I feel this to be a just boast, and the calamitous state of our country is more than a volume to prove the correctness of it. We always told you we were right and you wrong, and do not the fruits manifest that we judged correctly? "By their fruits shall ye know them," is an unerring rule; by that rule you are found wanting. Your fruits are not good, therefore we have a right, at least, to condemn the heads, if not the hearts, of those who love those fruits.

You took the country in a high state of prosperity, and you admit that it is now otherwise. You admit you are sinking, and call loudly upon us for help; and if we offer assistance, we discover you wish us to do that, or help you to do that, which has produced the evils under which we suffer. Most willingly would we help you, if you would accept of the services which could do you any good, but, should we do as you wished, we should only sink you still deeper.

A gentleman from Georgia (Mr. BARNETT) also called for union, and he used some expressions immensely calculated to promote an object he seemed most ardently to desire. He said he would administer hemp and confiscation, and also a new specific, which I had not before heard of—"Mowhawk tea." The first is old, it has been spoken formerly by a zealous gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. WRIGHT.) For the first time, sir, we have no particular longing at the North, we should not take it kindly; and the latter, when explained, "powder and lead," may be equally unacceptable, used as the gentleman means. We should not like a dose of either, when administered, as was intended by him, or as was expressed by a colleague of that gentleman, (Mr. TROUP,) "to be shot like a dog." We, somehow, have an aversion to be forced to do what we dislike, and it will require, possibly, more force than can be raised on that side to accomplish the object of conciliation by hanging or shooting us.

Mr. MOSELEY said, he begged gentlemen who were anxious either for the question or the floor, not to be alarmed. He would detain them but a very short time. It was not his intention to go into a particular consideration of the merits of the bill. He was satisfied with the discussion it had already undergone. It had, in his opinion, been most clearly shown that the bill was unconstitutional in its principles; odious, tyrannical, and oppressive, in its provisions, and altogether unworthy the sanction of this House, as the legislators of a free and enlightened people.

His object in rising was principally to notice some of the remarks which had fallen from gentlemen in the course of this debate. It had been repeatedly stated and urged with much confidence that the war, in which we are engaged, has been as successful and well conducted as could rationally be expected. And that what little of misfortune had attended it, was to be ascribed chiefly to Federal opposition.

That gentlemen should predict favorably is not extraordinary. They have unfortunately been too much in the habit of doing this. But that they should, in the face of surrounding facts, boast of past success and good management, was really more than he should have believed.

Suppose, sir, said Mr. M., that at the time we were about declaring this war; when so many flattering predictions were made respecting it; and with others, the one so often mentioned, that in a very few weeks Canada would inevitably be conquered—for then it appeared to be within the scope of our vast designs, to conquer Canada; and he recollected to have heard gentlemen expatiate with great delight upon the incalculable advantage which must result from the annexation of these provinces to the United States;—suppose that some gentleman opposed to the war had then risen in his place and predicted, that you would not in the course of three campaigns, after expending millions of money, and sacrificing thousands of lives, be able to obtain one foot of Canada. That before you could conquer Canada or any part of it, your own capital would be in possession of the enemy, the splendid Hall you then occupied reduced to ashes, and your Administration, with the President at their head, be seen flying for safety before the British. Nay, more sir, that before you should have proceeded two years with this just and necessary war, every object for which it was declared should be abandoned, and that you would be unable even then to procure a peace upon terms so humiliating. Would not the man who should have made this prediction, which has been literally fulfilled, have been pronounced a madman or a traitor, unworthy the least regard or confidence? And yet the invasion of this city, with its consequent evils, are but items in the long list of calamities brought upon the country, by the war in which we are engaged.

And what are our future prospects? He said he felt no disposition to dwell upon the disasters which we have already experienced, or to magnify those to which we must be exposed in its further progress. But is it wise to shut our eyes against dangers which threaten us? Are our resources more ample than they have been? Or will they in the same hands be more ably and skilfully applied? Has the war grown more popular as it has progressed? Are the innumerable hosts of those who have pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, in support of this war, now found ready to step forward and redeem their pledges? One would have supposed from the professions of patriotic zeal and military ardor, which were formerly witnessed throughout the nation, that upon the slightest call the very pillars of the earth would have been shaken by the trampling of volunteers to Canada, or wherever their services might be needed, and for any term of time.

And what are we now told, not by those unfriendly to the war, who are charged with a disposition to embarrass every measure, and view everything through the darkest medium, but by gentlemen friendly to the war, and zealous for its support? Sir, has it not been said upon this floor, that men cannot now be induced by motives of patriotism, nor by the immense bounties in money and land offered, to enter the service, and that recourse must be had to coercive measures, to conscription, to fill up your ranks; that Congress had declared war, and the people had supported them in that declaration, and that they should now be compelled to fight whether they were willing or not; and in pursuance of this principle is the bill on your table. Sir, if it has come to this, if the Government have in the first place to conquer the people, in order to compel them to conquer a peace, their prospect of a speedy and honorable termination of this war is, to say the least, not very promising.

If the conscription system, even under the military despotism of Bonaparte, was attended with difficulties, he would leave gentlemen to judge of its probable result in a Government where, it is to be hoped, there remains some portion of that spirit by which their liberty and independence was achieved.

Mr. M. observed, that it was not his object, as he stated when he rose, to detain the House by repetition, for he could add nothing to the objections which had been so ably urged against the principles and provisions of this bill by gentlemen who had preceded him. And he would frankly declare that he should not vote for the bill were it ever so perfect. He had never voted for any bill to raise men for the prosecution of this war, and he should not begin with the present.

He knew it was said, that the character of the war was changed, and that it had now become the duty of all parties to unite in its support. But he could perceive no change in the character of the war or its authors, to justify a change of conduct in those who were originally opposed to it, and who have uniformly refused upon principle to give it their aid. Nor is their co-operation more necessary now, than it has ever been. The supplies requisite for the operations of Government do not depend on their votes. When, as was observed by an honorable gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. WEBSTER,) "such a condition of things shall happen, it will bring its own rule of action along with it."

And gentlemen in vain attempt to ascribe their want of success in this war to any opposition either in or out of this House. There has been no opposition but what they were bound to expect.

Is not the majority in this House sufficient to control the minority; and to carry every measure when and how they please? He said when, because it was well known they possess and exercise the power of putting an immediate end to debate, when from any cause it becomes troublesome. They can instantly put to silence every argument of their opponents. Not by any intellectual efforts, not by any old-fashioned logical process, but by the magic power of the previous question, which proves at once—not what some speculative writers have attempted to show, that mind may become omnipotent over matter; but that matter may be made omnipotent over mind.

DECEMBER, 1814.

Militia Draughts.

H. OF R.

Having obtained this species of triumph, gentlemen, no doubt, felicitate themselves with the conclusive inference, that they must be right, when nothing can be said against them.

No sir: gentlemen, he remarked, must look to other causes than to the opposition of the minority for their want of better success in this war; for the deplorable state of their Treasury, and the wretched condition to which the country is reduced.

But he would venture to predict, if they were determined to prosecute the war by a recourse to such measures as are provided in the present bill, that they would have no occasion for future committees of investigation to inquire into the causes of the failure of their arms.

Mr. M. said he meant no improper menace to the House; but an allusion had been made to the late public proceedings in the State from which he was a Representative, and he was sorry to say, that he had heard some expressions of a threatening nature.

He would assure gentlemen, that there was no terror in their threats, to deter the people of that State from any course of duty, which they should deliberately prescribe to themselves. So long as the General Government shall respect their rights, and faithfully discharge its duties towards them, so long they would not be found wanting on their part. But the same principles, the same feelings, and, he would beg leave to say, the same intelligence, which would ever secure from them obedience when due, would prevent them at all hazards from yielding it when arbitrarily and unconstitutionalily demanded.

After a short but animated speech of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, in opposition to the motion, the question on striking out the first section of the bill was decided in the negative, yeas 44. And the Committee rose and reported the bill to the House; which immediately adjourned.

SATURDAY, December 10.

The bill from the Senate, "to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America," was read the first time, and, on motion, the said bill was read the second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on carriages for the conveyance of persons, and the harness used therefor," with amendments; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

MILITIA DRAUGHTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the Senate's bill, to authorize the President to call into service 80,430 militia, for the defence of the frontiers.

A motion was made by Mr. STOCKTON of New Jersey to postpone the bill indefinitely.

13th CON. 3d Sess.—27

On this motion Mr. STOCKTON addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I have moved for the indefinite postponement of this bill before the amendments made in the Committee of the whole House are disposed of—not with any wish to interpose artificial obstructions to its passage through the House, but to secure to myself, and to other gentlemen, the common privilege of expressing our opinions upon a great political subject; a precaution made the more necessary by the intimations thrown out yesterday of an intention of stopping further discussion by a resort to the previous question. I can assure you, sir, that I rise to advocate this motion in no spirit of party or of opposition; but because I feel myself constrained, by all the ties which bind me to my constituents and country, to make use of every exertion to prevent the passage of the bill. I know the difficulties which at this moment surround the Government and the nation. I know, and I feel, as sensibly as any member can feel, the crisis—the awful crisis, at which our public affairs have arrived. I know, sir, that we are engaged in a war with a powerful, irritated, and revengeful enemy. Since the late despatches from Europe have been submitted to us, I have been induced to believe that the Administration could not at this moment make a just and honorable peace if it were now really disposed so to do. I admit that there is too much ground to apprehend that if this war is continued for another campaign, it will require a great exertion to maintain the just rights and integrity of the United States. I know that our treasury is empty and must be filled—that our public credit is gone and must be restored—that the ranks of our army are thin and must be increased—all this I know—and, without stopping now to inquire why or wherefore these things are, I am ready to act accordingly. I am willing to accept the invitation of an honorable member from Kentucky, (Mr. DUVAL,) and to sacrifice for the good of the public. I am willing at this moment to forget all that I have ever thought and believed of this terrible war. I am willing to forget the folly, the political insanity, in which it was declared—the neglect, the culpable neglect, to provide the necessary means of carrying it on—the waste—the profuse and shameful waste of blood and treasure, which has marked its progress. Although every event since that fatal step was taken has confirmed me in these opinions, I am willing to forget them all, and to act as if they did not exist. I am willing to place them upon the altar of public safety, and there to immolate them. I am willing, for myself, to go further, and to refrain from all irritating expressions in reference to those who hold the reins of Government and control the destinies of the nation. I most sincerely pray that our gloomy forebodings as to the issue of affairs in their hands may not be realized—that they may be able to extricate the country from the dangers which surround it, and to make a speedy, lasting, and honorable peace. I have already acted in conformity with these professions, by voting during this session for every measure intended to increase your revenues or armies, which appeared to me to be Constitutional, and founded on principles of justice and equality, and I shall continue so to act. But, Mr. Speaker, there are bounds which every man of principle must observe. There are some limits which neither arguments, difficulties, nor dangers, can induce me to exceed. The limits which I have prescribed to myself in providing for the exigencies of the day are just and indispensable—they are, the Constitution; the general principles of political expediency; the eternal, immutable principles of justice, equal justice, to all the community. These principles I must and will adhere to at all hazards. To me, sir, public wants can afford no inducement to vote for an act which my best judgment informs me transcends the legitimate powers of Congress. To me, State necessity can be no plea for resorting to wild and visionary plans, which, though they may be honestly intended to redeem the public credit, I conscientiously believe will sink it deeper into ruin. Nor, sir, will necessity ever induce me in the imposition of taxes to violate the great principles of justice and equality. With these exceptions, I am willing to go as far as any other member in providing the proper means of defending the rights and interests of these United States. In regard to the bill now on the table, I have read it with attention, bestowing upon it all the consideration its importance demanded. I have endeavored to analyze its objects and provisions. I have listened with the most respectful attention to everything which has been said in its favor. The result is a solemn conviction that we have no Constitutional right to pass the bill in its present shape, and that it will be destructive of the best interests of this country to enact it. Will you listen to me, Mr. Speaker, whilst I state as concisely as I can the reasons which have induced me to form this opinion? In performing this task, I shall endeavor to adhere strictly to the bill. There are, indeed, other most important matters intimately connected with it, which, as parts of the same general plan, would be proper objects of remark; but from these I shall refrain at present—I allude particularly to the proposed draught of the militia to fill the ranks of the regular army. On this monstrous device I shall make no remarks now. That bill may never be called up. It is already damned in public estimation—I trust that it is sleeping the sleep of death, and that it will never be raised to affright and afflict us. Mr. Speaker, there are certain general principles which lie at the bottom of this subject. In a limited Government, such as that established by the Constitution of the United States, they may truly be called fundamental. By some they may be considered as familiar and true—and by others as scarcely worthy of attention in these enlightened days. But the great men to whom we are indebted for our independence and civil institutions, thought differently. They supposed that they were all-important. They believed that it was always necessary to bear them in mind, and advisable frequently to recur to them, to keep this Government within its proper sphere, and to defend the rights and liberties of the people. One of these general principles is, that the militia of the several States belongs to the people and Government of the States, and not to the Government of the United States. I consider this, sir, as a proposition too clear to require illustration, or to admit of doubt. The militia consists of the whole people of a State, or rather of the whole male population capable of bearing arms; including all of every description, avocation, or age. Exemption from militia duty is a mere matter of grace. This militia, being the very people, belongs to the people or to the State governments, for their use and protection. It was theirs at the time of the Revolution, under the old Confederation, and when the present form of government was adopted. Neither the people nor their State governments have ever surrendered this their property in the militia to the General Government, but have carefully kept and preserved their general dominion or control, for their own use protection, and defence. They have, it is true, granted or lent (if I may use such an expression) to Congress a special concurrent authority or power over the militia in certain cases; which cases are particularly set down, guarded, limited, and restricted, as fully as the most scrupulous caution, and the use of the most apt and significant words our language affords, could limit and restrict them. The people have granted to Congress a right to call forth the militia in certain cases of necessity and emergency—a right to arm and organize them—and to prescribe a plan, upon which they shall be disciplined and trained. When they are called into the service of the United States (and they cannot be called, unless upon the happening of one of the contingencies enumerated) they are to be under the command of the President. Hence it follows that the general power, authority, or jurisdiction, remains in the State governments. A special, qualified, limited, and concurrent power is vested in Congress, to be exercised when the event happens, and in the manner pointed out, prescribed, and limited in the Constitution. And hence it also follows, that this delegated power cannot be executed upon any other occasion, nor in any other ways than those prescribed by the Constitution. There is another general rule or principle of construction to which I must allude. It is, that all particular, special, and limited powers, taken from or carved out of the general power, must be construed strictly. The general power remains in full force, unimpaired, except where it is expressly granted away, and the construction must be on the words of the grant, and not by recurring to the doctrine of analogy or parity of reason. This is a rule applicable to all grants of power, public or private, but it is particularly to be attended to in grants of public authority; and most of all in those solemn grants denominated constitutions. These grants, being from the people to their rulers, are always deliberately framed. They are penned with the utmost accuracy and precision of language. All powers intended to be granted, and those not included in the terms made use of, are withheld. This is not a mere technical rule of the schoolmen or the forum. It is founded in reason, good sense, and justice; and is all-important in the construction of constitutions. If the words of such grants are departed from, upon any pretence, what safety do they afford? If reasoning by analogy is once permitted, so that cases not enumerated, but supposed to stand upon a footing in point of reason and expediency, are, by liberal construction, held to be included in it, what security is there but the discretion of those who undertake to expound it? A constitution should be considered as a pillar of marble, not as a figure of wax; it must remain as it comes from the hand of the artist, and not be moulded by officious hands into a more convenient shape. The rule I have laid down, has been considered of sufficient importance to be engrafted into the Constitution itself. The tenth amendment, in ordaining that "all powers not delegated by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively and to the people," declares, in the spirit of the rule I have stated, that all powers not granted to the Congress by the Constitutional charter, remain with the people or the State governments.

H. OF R.

Militia Draughts.

Militia Draughts.

H. OF R.

Mr. Speaker, this special, limited, concurrent power over the militia, is given by the States to Congress only in three cases—"to enforce the laws, suppress insurrections, and repel invasion." I call it a special concurrent power, and it is clearly no more; for the States, notwithstanding this grant, retain the power to call forth their militia for the same or any other lawful purpose. There is, then, no grant of absolute power even in these cases; and the people and the State governments have not only the right of insisting upon a strict observance of the limitation, but the corresponding right to resist all encroachments upon what they have reserved unto themselves—for, as it is of the very essence of a limited government to be kept within its proper orbit, so it is the unquestionable right and duty of the people to oblige those who administer it to preserve this boundary, and to resist and repel illegal encroachments.

I consider these principles to be unquestionable. They will, I should hope, receive the assent of every gentleman of this House. Be this as it may, I flatter myself that they will stand the test of the severest scrutiny; and, being established, the only question must be, whether the act now under consideration is a proper execution of the limited authority vested in Congress, to "call forth the militia to repel invasion."

In examining this question, I shall not follow the example which has been set by some of the advocates for the bill; I shall spend no time in ransacking ancient and modern history for precedents or examples of governments asserting the right of making every man a soldier. In my opinion, it is nothing to the purpose to examine what was the law in Greece or Rome, or what has been the practice of George III. or of Bonaparte—the question is exclusively an American question. I shall keep it in mind that I am in the American Congress, considering an American act, to be tested by the American Constitution, and shall not trouble the House in going over matters so entirely useless and inapplicable.

The bill before us is curiously framed. There is little or no coincidence between the title and the provisions of the bill; between the pretended and the real objects. But its best friends can discover only two objects apparent on its face: First, to call out eighty thousand militia for the defence of the frontiers against invasion; or, secondly, to compel these eighty thousand militia to furnish forty thousand regular soldiers.

Supposing these to be the real objects, and that the provisions of the bill were adapted to them, it can be easily proved that they are unauthorized by the Constitution. Let me ask, sir, what section of the Constitution empowers Congress to call forth the militia to defend the frontiers from invasion? None can be produced—and it never was the intention of the people to grant such a power. A power to call forth the militia to "defend the frontiers against invasion," would be a general power to make use of the militia during a war; it would be destitute of all substantial limitation, and might be exercised without control. Such a power, not depending upon notorious fact, would include in it a right to order out the militia for the common purposes of war—when and where, and for as long a time as Congress should see fit. If Congress may call them forth for the general purpose of defence, who is to judge—who, but itself, can judge of the necessity and propriety of the call? Such a power would necessarily destroy those limitations so carefully provided, and place the whole militia of the United States under the control of the General Government for the general purposes of war. They might be marched from the seaboard to the northwestern frontier, and there be kept during a war, doing duty as garrison soldiers; or, in other words, as regular soldiers, under the pretext that they were called forth to defend the frontiers. Indeed, I can see no reason why, if this construction be correct, they may not be marched to those remote regions before the war is actually declared; or why they may not be kept there until it ended. If the power be that of employing the militia for the general purposes of defence, where is the necessity of waiting until the war is actually declared? Surely, a prudent Government would not wait until that event took place, before it provided the means of defence. A wise Government, intending to wage a war, would be so provident as at least to place its frontiers in a state of defence, before it drew the sword; and as the duty of defending the frontiers would exist as long as the war, it is manifest, if the militia could be called forth for this general purpose, they might be detained there as long as the occasion existed; or, in other words, during the war.

But no such power is given, or was intended to be given. The power actually given to Congress is to call forth the militia to repel invasion—not to defend the frontiers from invasion. The power claimed by this bill is, that whenever Congress think an invasion probable, they may call forth the militia to guard against it.

The power granted by the Constitution is, that when an invasion takes place, Congress may call forth the militia to repel it.

The powers are not the same, but essentially and substantially different. The one is general, depending for its just exercise on will and discretion. The other is limited, guarded by express words, and defended against perversion, by the requirement of a notorious fact, of the existence of which the State governments are as competent to judge and decide, as the Government of the United States.

The power claimed, in its practical operation, places the militia of the States, without limitation as to number or time of service, in the power of Congress.

The power granted only authorizes calling them out on a particular emergency, which carries with it its own limitation, both as to numbers and time of service.

The power claimed subjects the militia to the general duty and service of the war. It makes them, in truth, regulars, though they are called militia; for the President may command them to perform every service without restriction, and at any place.

The power granted preserves the essential quality of being called out in aid of a regular army, upon the contemplated emergency happening, and of returning to their homes as soon as the emergency has ceased.

The power claimed subjects the citizen to be made a soldier without his consent, for any length of time. For whether he shall serve one year, or two, or ten, or during a war, is admitted to be only a matter of sound discretion.

The power granted leaves him all his rights as a citizen; guards and protects him in the service required; calls him to arms to repel an invader; and, as soon as he is repelled, returns the citizen to his family.

Mr. Speaker, I consider the claim now for the first time set up by the General Government to the personal service of every citizen—subjecting him to be made a soldier, under the pretence of defending against invasion, and binding him to military service whether it happens or not, and after the enemy is expelled, as entirely unwarranted, whether we regard the words of the Constitutional grant, or the manifest intention of its makers. The people have never vested such a power in Congress—they have reserved it to themselves, or it is deposited, together with the general mass of sovereignty, in the State Governments.

The noxious illegal character of this bill is not at all taken away or altered by the amendment made in Committee, requiring only a service of one year instead of two. It is true, that it alleviates its harshness: it will be less oppressive. It may be more palatable, and, for that reason, it may be more dangerous. When the oppressor assumes the form of a giant, he creates alarm, and will be sure to meet with due opposition. When oppression comes like a mighty flood to overwhelm the privileges of the people, they will not fail to breast the torrent with firmness and spirit. But, when he assumes a reasonable shape—a common form;—when the measure carries with it the imposing pretence of public wants, or public defence; and, especially, when the original plan is softened and meliorated in its application; then we are apt to comfort ourselves that it is no worse, and and finally to disregard the dangerous principle that lurks beneath.

The amendment leaves the objection to the principle of the bill in full force. Congress have it not in their power to call forth the militia for a year, a month, or a day, except to repel invasion, execute the laws, and suppress insurrection.

It appears to me that the power now claimed, of using the militia of the several States, for the general purposes of war, under pretext of defending the frontier from invasion, is not only unfounded, in the fair interpretation of the Constitution, by the words and evident meaning of the granting clause, but that it is inconsistent with other parts of the charter; that it reverses the whole plan or scheme of Government; destroying its symmetry, and removing some of its most important balances and checks.

One principal and avowed object of the Federal Constitution was, to provide for the public defence, and to take that duty from the individual States, and impose it upon the General Government. Experience, during the war of the Revolution, had taught how little the State Governments were to be relied on to perform this important task. It had been found that acting without obligatory union, oftentimes under the influence of narrow, interested politics, they were not to be trusted for steady efforts, proportionate to relative ability, or to the interests which they had at stake. The people had become tired of a Government of requisitions, which could not be enforced. They called for one, which, acting immediately on the population, would possess the power of securing due respect to its own Constitutional demands. Hence they imposed the great duty of public defence on the General Government, and furnished it with most ample means to enable it to perform the service required. They endowed it, not only with the high powers of making war and peace, but with those also of raising regular armies, and of imposing taxes. Thus it became invested with the great powers of the sword and the purse, of raising men and money, without limitation, as to number or sum; having no bounds but the public wants, and the great principles of civil liberty. Having thus provided and vested in the Federal Government, all the means requisite to the great end in view, the State Governments are absolved from the general duty, and are merely required to furnish their militia to aid in repelling an invader. It is evident, then, to me, that the Constitution contemplated a regular army as the steady and proper means of public defence in time of war; the militia as a temporary auxiliary force, to be called in aid on emergency or sudden onset. But the plan of this bill reverses everything. Instead of the Federal Government providing for the public defence, by the means surrendered to it; instead of raising armies, to defend the States, in a war declared by itself—it calls on the States to defend the Union. The militia of the particular States must be called forth to defend the United States. The militia is converted into the regular force, the regulars into the auxiliary!

The experience of the Revolution and the paternal warnings of their illustrious Chief had further taught the people, that militia were not to be relied on in a war with a foreign Power; that they were a most expensive and ineffectual force; that every principle of sound policy forbade their being called from their occupations and business, to be made soldiers; nevertheless, their usefulness in aiding a regular army, on sudden emergency, had oftentimes been experienced, and was well known. The plan, therefore, was to defend the country, in case of foreign war, by regulars, and to add the qualified authority, to call forth the militia, on the emergency contemplated. This was a wise and safe course, and it is folly and weakness in the extreme to attempt to alter it.

There was also a further reason for leaving the general authority over the militia in the State governments, and denying it to the General Government;—that it might be a check upon the great powers of war and peace, sword and purse, thus surrendered to the General Government. The Federal Government is not only a limited Government, but it is furnished with its balances and checks. It was framed upon the principle, that no set of men can be safely trusted with power, without some means left elsewhere to keep it within proper bounds. It was this proud principle of jealousy of power, wherever it might be deposited, that produced the Revolution. That great event was not so much brought about by actual oppression, as by the assertion of principles which were derogatory to the rights of free-men. So thought the great men who formed and adopted this Constitution. They were high-minded republicans in deed, and not merely in the name. Their political creed was, that no set of men were to be trusted with discretionary powers. They knew that paper limitations were useless, unless accompanied by the means. Hence they denied some powers to the General, and some to the State Governments. They limited others; and when they bestowed general powers on the Federal head, the means of a wholesome control was left with the people and the State Governments. But these salutary principles are now out of fashion. They are either unknown, forgotten, or disregarded. The plan of the Republican Administration has been evidently to accumulate power in the Executive branch of the Government, from the President down to the lowest collector, or tax gatherer. Scarcely is a bill reported upon any subject, relating either to war or revenue, which does not contain some covert attack on the unquestionable rights of a free people. It is manifest to me that the Constitution contains no grant of the militia to the Federal Government for the general purpose of even defensive war. When this instrument was before the people, such a power as is now contended for was never attributed to it, either by its enemies or its friends. On the other hand, when the great and dangerous powers actually granted by it, such as those of making war and peace, raising armies, and imposing taxes, were objected to by honest and enlightened opposers, the answer was (and it is a sound one if the Constitution is executed in its true sense and spirit) that there was a sufficient security against abuses in the habits of the people, their aversion from war, and their spirit of liberty; but especially in the State Governments, and their militia. And I might, with perfect safety, hazard the assertion, that if the power, now contended for, to call forth the whole militia for the general purposes of war, without any regard to the Constitutional limitation, or to time or place of service, had been inserted in plain terms in the charter, it would have been rejected.

But, Mr. Speaker, perhaps it may be demanded of me whether the militia may not be called forth until an invasion actually takes place. It may be asked, must the Government wait until the enemy lands upon our shores, before it can resort to this force? Upon this point I would answer, that the act of Congress passed in 1795, to carry into effect that part of the Constitution now under consideration, places this subject on its proper footing. The act authorizes the President to call forth the militia in case of invasion, or imminent danger of invasion. This, in terms, is an extension of the provisions of the instrument, and it certainly goes to the very verge of the Constitutional limit; but I am disposed to think that it is a sound exposition of its true intent and meaning. The words of this law, not to be found in the Constitution, are these—"imminent danger of invasion," and they seem to have been carefully selected for their accuracy and precision. By imminent danger is meant—impending, threatening danger—danger at hand. It does not include danger only expected, or probable, resulting from a general state of war. For instance, it is no such emergency as is provided for in the Constitution, that we are engaged in a war with a powerful nation, and that there is a moral certainty that she will invade some part of our territory. This would induce a provident Administration to have a good army in the field, but does not authorize ordering the militia into actual service. But, if the President were now in possession of information, that a large expedition had been prepared for and was on its way to attack New Orleans, (as we have reason to believe he is,) he need not delay his call on the militia until the enemy shall arrive, but he may lawfully call on those of the contiguous States, to meet and repel that invasion, whenever the enemy shall make his appearance. So, if a fleet should arrive at Sandy Hook, or at the Capes of the Delaware; it might require a long time to enable them to get up and land their troops. Still the President need not wait until they have landed; because these are cases of invasion, or of imminent danger of invasion, within the fair meaning of the words of the Constitution.

This statute of 1795 asserts no power to call forth the militia for the general purposes of war, or to defend the frontiers; but only to repel invasion actually made or depending. Yet this statute was drawn with the utmost care, and was doubtless intended to occupy all the ground given to the General Government by the Constitution, as it was then understood. It is entitled to the utmost respect and weight, as a Legislative declaration how far this right extends, and what are its just limits.

It is unnecessary to detain the House in remarking on the circumstance that the enemy are in possession of some part of the territory of the United States, as that circumstance can afford no aid to this bill, and indeed does not seem to be much relied on. None of the provisions of this bill are adapted to that case. It is not designed to enable the President to call forth the militia to expel them. The existing laws are already fully competent to this end. He may call forth the militia to repel this invasion. But the object of this bill is to form a militia armament, not to expel those invaders, but to serve for one year. The enemy is left in quiet possession of what he has taken, and this army is to be raised to carry on the war as the President shall direct. It may be marched into Canada, leaving the invaders behind. But more of this hereafter.

As to the second object of this bill, which is to induce this corps of 80,000 militia to furnish 40,000 regulars; to be sure it does not figure in the title of the act; yet it has been avowed by many gentlemen to be the real object which this bill is to attain.

I cannot avoid remarking, how admirably the title of this act has been contrived, to give notice of a matter which is not to be found in the bill—that is, a plan to defend the frontiers against invasion, and to conceal what it does contain, an illegal device to compel the militia to furnish recruits for the regular army. But surely those gentlemen who excused themselves in voting for it, although they acknowledge that it is no militia bill, because it affords a prospect of supplying the ranks of the regular army; surely such gentlemen have not considered, that if Congress have no right to call for the militia as this bill does call for them, neither can it possess even a pretence of right to require them to furnish regulars, as the commutation proposed for the militia service. But if there is no right to require the principal duty there can be none to require the substitute. If the obligation to serve in the militia, as this bill requires, does not exist, the alternative ought not to exist. This need only be stated to receive the assent of every just man in the community. Then, to demand by law what we have no right to demand—to impose on the people a burden which we have no right to impose, and oblige them to perform it, or to provide a substitute, will at once give to the whole process the character of illegal compulsion. To class the militia for purposes, not within our control; to require of them a service, which they are not bound to perform; and then to excuse them if they will furnish half the number of regular soldiers—what is this but coercion? what is this but classing the militia, and draughting them to furnish recruits for the regular army? It becomes conscription; which is nothing more than obliging men to serve in the army, or to furnish others to serve, without their consent, and without the authority of Constitutional law. It is conscription of the most odious character. The form and shape given to it are the most offensive that could be proposed to a free people. It is concealed and covert—it is injustice perpetrated under the pretence and color of rightful authority.

The friends of the bill are then reduced to this dilemma. If the bill is really a militia bill, it is unconstitutional, and should be rejected. If it is not a militia bill, (as some of the majority have contended,) but the real object is to obtain regulars, this is still more objectionable, and should receive no countenance in this House.

Mr. Speaker, I shall now proceed to consider the provisions of this bill. My observations will be general. I shall not trouble the House with descending to particulars. And I cannot refrain from again remarking on the title of this bill—its deceptive form and character. It affects to inform the reader that he may within expect to find a plan for calling forth the militia to defend the frontiers against invasion, and yet there is not a single provision to be found in the enacting clauses adapted to such an object. The plan which the bill develops is, to class the militia, under the direction and authority of the President. They are then to be draughted. Those selected are to be organized into regiments and brigades, and are to pass at once into the United States service. There is no provision regulating the particular service upon which they are to be employed; there is nothing to confine the service to the Constitutional emergencies, to repel invasions, to execute the laws, or to suppress insurrections. But the men are put under martial law and must serve as they shall be ordered. The bill pursues no plan of a militia law heretofore passed. It has not a militia feature in it; but on the contrary prostrates at once all their rights and privileges. It may, sir, be laid down as a general proposition, that a bill professing to be a militia bill, but which disregards and destroys all the essential qualities of the militia armament, which deprives the militiaman of inherent fundamental rights, rights always acknowledged and possessed, cannot be consistent with the Constitutional powers of this Government. The rights of the militia were long known and universally acquiesced in, before this Government acquired its qualified jurisdiction over them. They claimed and exercised these rights during the war of the Revolution, and at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. Congress received the powers it possesses subject to these privileges. They are founded in justice, and in the intrinsic nature of a force composed of the whole body of the people. They are supported by prescription or constant usage. When I speak of militia rights, I mean these: to be called out for short periods of emergency; to be taken from places contiguous, and not to be compelled to serve elsewhere; to serve only in just rotation with others. An act which violates all these principles may be safely called no militia law, but an unconstitutional requisition.

When the bill came from the Senate, the term of service required by it was two years. We have reduced it to one. The principle however is not changed. The obligation to serve is absolute, peremptory, unconditional. There is no one provision limiting the service by any contingency. If the enemy, in one month after this force shall be organized, should be driven to the walls of Quebec, or besieged in Halifax, still the militiaman must be a soldier. What section of the Constitution, let me ask, authorizes this? What letter of that instrument enables Congress to fix any absolute time of service? The legal call is to repel invasion. It carries with it its own limitation. The obligation to serve lasts so long, and no longer, as the particular invasion for which the service is required exists. It is to be remarked, that the act of 1795, before alluded to, contains no provision ascertaining how long the militia called forth to serve in the cases stated in the Constitution, shall serve; it leaves it in this respect as it ought to be left, to the intrinsic limitation of the granting clause. But it ordains that they shall not be required to serve more than three months in any one year; thereby guarding and protecting this essential quality of militia service. This is a correct exposition of the limited Constitutional grant. The words of that charter carried with them the intended limitation, and therefore it was unnecessary to insert another. But as it might so happen, that invasion, or one of the other exigencies, might endure longer than a militiaman ought to be compelled to serve, care was taken that they should not on any pretence be required to serve for more than three months out of twelve.

There appears to me to exist no right to fix the time of service but for the purpose of establishing a day beyond which they shall not be required to serve. The period of service which the Government may rightfully demand, is quite another thing, and depends entirely on the exigency out of which the right to call them forth may arise. If the call is to enforce the laws, the right of service ceases when the empire of the laws are restored. If to suppress insurrections; when the insurgents are quelled. If to repel invasions; when the invader is driven back. If prudence—if reasons of State, or alleged necessity, require a long period of service, recourse must be had to the State Legislature. The State governments are absolute, except where they are controlled by their own constitutions. They may safely be trusted—they would co-operate with the General Government in all necessary measures of defence as long as that Government respected their rights, and performed its relative duties.

The next characteristic privilege of the militia is to be taken from a State contiguous to that where service is required; and how is this to be secured? There is but one method of effecting it—adhere to the Constitution; construe it according to its words and plain intent; confine the power of Congress to call forth the militia to the enumerated cases; do this, and this important privilege is secured. These are all the cases of emergency. If the militia cannot be called forth until the emergency exists, then they must necessarily be taken from the contiguous neighborhoods or States. But, as I have before stated, this bill contains no provision that the militia shall not be called into actual service until the exigencies occur; nor that they shall be called from the adjacent parts of the neighboring States; but they are left in these important respects altogether in the power of the President. The rules of martial law will oblige them to obey. They may be marched from Maine to Louisiana. There is no limitation in regard to the place where the service is to be performed. In the bill, as it came to us, there was a section restraining the right of service to the State from whence the militia came, or to the next adjoining; but this we have stricken out, thereby declaring our opinions to be that the power is unlimited in this particular, and they may rightfully be sent anywhere. As the bill now stands, under the specious pretext of defending the frontiers, the militia of New Jersey may be marched to Detroit or to Maine; acting on the favorite maxim of the Administration, that the United States must be defended in Canada, that the invasion of that country is a measure purely defensive, these troops may be ordered to Quebec or Montreal. And if they refuse to pass the frontiers they are called forth to defend, they may be shot as mutineers. It is nothing to the purpose to say, that the President will exercise a sound discretion, and will not order these men to serve at a great distance from their homes. If the Constitution has not subjected the militia to the discretion of the President, we have no right to do so by law. What a freeman may claim as an undoubted right, he ought not to be compelled to receive as a favor.

This bill also destroys the great principle of rotation, by which I mean the important privilege of every freeman, not to be subject to military service, but in a just proportion of time with other freemen of his vicinage. This appears to me to be a most important privilege. The militia consists of all the people—the entire male population. They have their rights, not only as between them and the Government, but as between each man and the residue. All cannot be called forth at a time, or the country would become a desert. Hence the right of each man is, that he shall only be called into actual service in just rotation with all others. To declare by law that one class shall absolutely serve for one, two, or ten years, is entirely unjust and illegal. Substantially, it makes them regular soldiers. Suppose the war should terminate with the year, then one class will have borne the whole burden. No such injustice takes place if we use them as militia ought to be used. If we require their services according to the intrinsic nature of the force, and as the rules of justice require, all will be right. They should be ordered out for short periods, and be often relieved during a campaign, so that no one class should be compelled to serve for a longer time than its equal tour of duty may demand. Let it not be urged that so short a service will prevent their improvement in the military art. The error is, in requiring of the militia a service to which they are incompetent, and for which they were never designed. The militia were not intended, and should never be relied on to fight pitched battles with a disciplined foe. They are only calculated to serve as an irregular auxiliary force, to harass and distress the enemy upon a sudden onset. The sooner they are brought into action after they leave their homes the better. They must have brave men to command them, and be employed in the service suited to their nature and genius. In a service adapted to them they will render essential aid. Thus employed, they dare to follow wherever their officers dare to lead. In a camp they will learn little that is good; there perhaps you may discipline select corps composed of the flower of your youth, but the militia en masse will learn little else than bad habits, and to become disgusted with your service. Let us then abandon the vain expectation of compelling the militia to do the duty and supply the place of regulars. Let us respect their rights, and they will be more useful. If we trample their privileges under foot, they will be less dangerous to the enemy than to their oppressors.

It is most worthy of remark, that in the act of 1795, all these essential characteristics of the militia force are carefully preserved. That act provides that they shall be called from the parts most contiguous to the place of danger. That they shall not serve more than three months in any one year, and each man only in due rotation with every other able-bodied man of the battalion to which he belongs. This act is entitled, as I before remarked, to the most profound respect, as a correct exposition of the Constitutional powers of the Federal Government over the militia of the States, not only because it was enacted while WASHINGTON was President and Hamilton his Counsellor, but from other circumstances. It is a revised law, a former act, passed in 1792, had been found defective. It was enacted at a time when the Government would naturally be disposed to execute all the authority vested in it; directly after the formidable insurrection in the western counties of Pennsylvania was crushed, and when a foreign war had been recently expected. It is a precedent well worthy to be followed, but of late years its principles have been disregarded. The time of service has been doubled by acts already passed. Now we are to quadruple it. We have rejected or disregarded its other wholesome provisions and restraints; and boldly demand an entire authority and control over the male population of the country. But, Mr. Speaker, it is apparent to me that this bill not only destroys the characteristic principles of the militia force, but that it prostrates at once the important personal rights of our citizens, and also of our State governments.

This bill will deprive all the citizens who shall fall under the draughts of their dearest personal rights. You force them against their will to be soldiers for a whole year. You drag them from their wives, their children, their occupations, their professions and trades. You consign them to the camp, and to the hardships and toils of a common soldier. You ruin them. Take the farmer from his plough; the tradesman from his shop; the laborer from his employment, and what but ruin can await men of moderate means and large families, depending upon daily industry for maintenance and support? When they return, at the close of the year, they will find their farms unproductive and in ruins; their customers gone; their business passed away into other hands, and their families in want. What will become of men, with small means, dependent upon daily and steady exertions? What will become of tenants who cultivate the lands of other men? Of the mechanics or laborers on whom this lot may fall? They will, I repeat it, be ruined. Besides, while we thus injure and destroy their families, we at the same time make slaves of them. We deprive them for a year of the inestimable right of civil liberty; we place them under martial law; expose them to military tribunals—to ignominious punishment—perhaps to death itself, for asserting what they believe to be their inalienable right. You make them slaves to their officers, many of whom will be their inferiors in worth and standing in society; perhaps to beardless boys, who, having never been taught themselves to obey, are sure to be insolent and overbearing in command.

Such will be the inevitable fate of your militia soldiers, if they are to perform this cruel service.

And why are they thus to be imposed upon? Will it be answered that it is to save the country? There is no necessity to save the country by such means. The people do not require us—they will not permit us thus to save them. What consolation will it be to them to be saved at such a price? If this war continues, as it probably will, another year, one hundred thousand more must be provided. The whole country may be impoverished and ruined. We ought to remember that we are legislating for American freemen. We may assure ourselves, that our countrymen possess this honorable trait of character, that, while they will be ever ready to submit to us if we are in the right, they will be equally on the alert to resist if we are in the wrong.

This bill also attacks the right and sovereignty of the State governments. Congress is about to usurp their undoubted rights—to take from them their militia. By this bill we proclaim that we will have their men; as many as we please; when and where, and for as long a time as we see fit, and for any service we see proper. Do gentlemen of the majority seriously believe that the people and the State governments will submit to this claim? Do they believe that all the States of this Union will submit to this usurpation? Have you attended to the solemn and almost unanimous declaration and protestation of the Legislature of Connecticut? Have you examined the cloud arising in the East? Do you yet perceive that it is black, alarming, portentous? Do you wish to put a match to it, and to plunge the country into discord and civil war? and when the enemy is at hand? No, you do not—you cannot mean to bring about such ills; you must see the necessity of union at such a time at this.

I speak not in the language of menace. But let me entreat you to desist from this course of measures. Give up, I entreat you, all the harsh features of this bill. Indeed you want no new act. The existing laws are sufficient for all fair purposes. Give up also, I conjure you, by the best interests of our common country—give up all the other acts you contemplate for raising armies by compulsion. Rely upon it, the people will not support you in such measures. Let me again ask you, as practical men, do you seriously believe that every State of this Union will submit to this compulsory system? Suppose that New England refuses, to what a condition do you reduce the Middle and Southern States, which may be disposed to submit! You will either invite them by their interests and feelings to join in the opposition, or you expose them to burdens to which the others successfully object. Thus they will be punished for their loyalty and devotion. Be reassured by me that these measures are not required to defend the country. You have no right to defend the country by such means. Such a defence will leave it not worth defending. It is not for me to offer any advice to this majority; but listen to me for a moment longer; hearken to my earnest entreaty; that you defend the country by Constitutional means; by such means as the people have been accustomed to, and which will command public confidence and approbation; give up, I again pray you, these cruel plans of compulsory service. Be warned, in season, that if you do not, you will convulse this Union to its very centre. Disguise them as you may, the people will discover the entering wedge of conscription. Let your defensive efforts be on our own soil; a few well disciplined regiments properly posted and commanded, aided by the militia, will perform wonders. Remember that recently less than fifteen hundred men have foiled and driven back with disgrace the best appointed and most numerous army that Britain has ever had in Canada. Raise armies by voluntary enlistment only. Be under no apprehension of failure. Employ trusty officers in the recruiting service; furnish them with money, and keep them constantly supplied. The efforts you hold out are abundantly sufficient to command men; if they are not, increase them. Encourage volunteer corps; arrange your militia under existing laws; arm them; but call them not from their homes until they are wanted. Respect their rights and interests; cultivate their good will by attending to their comfort and wants; leave them to their own commanders; interfere not with the State governments respecting their militia, but encourage them to make exertions for the common defence. Pass an act guaranteeing the pay of the militia which may be advanced by the States. Pursue a Constitutional and conciliatory course, and you may safely rely upon the strength, valor, and patriotism of the people.

Mr. SHEFFEX, of Virginia, next addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I beg the attention of the House, while I submit a few observations on the subject under consideration. It is not my intention to investigate the details of the bill before you minutely, but to confine my remarks to some general principles, which have been brought into discussion. With the honorable member from New Jersey, (Mr. STOCKTON,) I am conscious of the awful crisis at which the affairs of this country have arrived; with him, I admit that ruin is staring us in the face on every side; with him, too, I feel it to be my duty to contribute my efforts to rescue this devoted nation from the impending calamities. Considering the revival of public credit, at present prostrate in the dust, and the security of the country from foreign danger of vital interest to us all, I shall most cordially co-operate in such measures as may be calculated to effect these great ends. I shall pursue this course, though I did not participate in the councils whose temerity and folly have precipitated us from the highest elevation of national prosperity, to the lowest abyss of suffering. But, with a sincere determination to go every reasonable length in the course thus marked out, I shall not consider myself bound to accord in every measure that may be proposed under the name of a remedy for existing evils. To obtain my approbation, there must be, according to my judgment, a natural connexion between the means and the end. The means, too, must be of a character suited to the spirit of free institutions, that the great principles of civil liberty, on which this Government is erected, shall not be violated.

Formidable and alarming as the dangers may be which threaten us from abroad, I shall not forget that the country has other interests at stake, of equal consideration with its independence, and as necessary to be preserved; that public liberty merits a full portion of our solicitude. It will be a paltry object to remain independent, unless we also remain free. Shall the shackles of domestic slavery be the only reward of this people for their toils and sufferings, in expelling from their soil a powerful enemy? For myself, sir, holding the opinion once entertained by some of the leading men now in power to be indubitably correct—that the liberties of a free people are most in danger at home, in time of foreign peril—I shall deem it my duty to look with a vigilant and jealous eye on the public measures. It will be an object of the first importance with me, that, when the valor and patriotism of the people shall have successfully resisted their external enemy, there may be left something worthy of their exertions; that there shall remain to them a country worth preserving.

The present period has given birth to doctrines more alarming than all the other dangers which surround us. On the part of those in power, claims have been set up, tending to subject the life and liberty of every member of the community to their arbitrary and unlimited control. Should they succeed in enforcing these claims by practical measures, the great principles of this Government must necessarily be subverted. Its character will no longer be free, or its powers limited. By one effort, they will alike prostrate the authority of the States and the liberties of the people.

The Secretary of War, the official author of these high-toned pretensions, recommends that we should raise a regular force of one hundred thousand men, to be employed in offensive operations in Canada. To obtain and keep up that number, he proposes, substantially, that the people shall be coerced into the ranks of the Army, if they will not, or cannot, procure the requisite number of recruits by contract. Aware that such a proposal would raise the indignant feelings of freemen, and that the power of this Government to adopt a measure so violent, would be seriously questioned, he submits to us a course of reasoning, which with him, and from what we have heard on this floor, with others, seems to be conclusive. He informs us that "Congress have a right, by the Constitution, to raise regular armies, and no restraint is imposed on the exercise of it"—that "an unqualified grant of power gives the means to carry it into effect." This, he says, "is a universal maxim, which admits of no exception." Hence, the honorable Secretary infers, that you have the power to drag the citizen from the land of his birth, to be slaughtered on the plains of Canada. To force the father, the only support of a destitute family, and the son, the comfort of his aged parents, to undergo the miseries of a camp in a foreign country. I meet this bold pretension as I would every attempt at usurpation. I deny the right to convert a nation of freemen into slaves, under any pretence whatever. I take upon myself to assert, that no such power can be exercised by this Government, or by any other which maintains any respect for the liberties of its people.

That the authority of this Government in the execution of its power (where not expressly restricted) is sovereign, I am not disposed to controvert; but that it is despotic, I can never admit. Every free Government possesses sovereign power over the means necessary to the attainment of its legitimate objects. But, in the selection of those means, the security of life, liberty, and property, cannot be disregarded; because that security forms the great end for which all power was granted. This great principle can never be infringed, or the people are not free. Hence, the opinion of some of the wisest and best men that ever lived, that laws violating this security, where the Government is not absolutely despotic, are void.

The objects for which the Government was instituted are not left to conjecture. The men who framed and those who adopted the present Constitution thought it necessary to transmit, to those who should live after them, the most conclusive evidence of the views with which they entered into this new political compact. Not content that they should be inferred from the limitations and restrictions of the powers granted, they declared them in terms thus express and unequivocal: "To form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure to themselves and to their posterity the blessings of liberty." These were the ends for the accomplishment of which all the powers vested by the Constitution, in the United States, were granted; and now it is asserted that the powers so granted may be executed in a manner wholly regardless of the ends in view—that, to "raise armies," the Government have the right to adopt measures by which the people and their posterity shall be deprived of the "blessings of liberty."

Sir, I have said that, if the principles assumed should receive countenance in this country, not only the liberties of the people, but the authority of the States, would be alike annihilated. There is no act of tyranny which may not be perpetrated with as much plausibility as the measure demanded by the Administration at our hands. It has already been ably shown by a member from New Hampshire, (Mr. WEBSTER,) that the same construction that authorizes you to drag the citizen by force into the ranks of your Army, will warrant you to enter into his dwelling and force from him his money. The analogy is unquestionably correct. The power to "borrow money" is as unrestrained as the power to "raise and support armies." Under the latter power you claim arbitrary dominion over the "life and liberty" of the citizen, because it contains no express restriction. Why, I ask, not over his money, when the power "to borrow" it is equally unrestrained? Is there any distinction in the nature and reason of the subject, that would make his money sacred, while his person is at your mercy? Will it be said that the poor man may be coerced in the field to meet misery and death, leaving a helpless family without support, and that his wealthier neighbor's money is not equally subject to your power? This cannot be asserted with the least shadow of reason. If there is power to compel the one to render his person, there is power to compel the other to render his money to your service.

The analogy becomes still stronger as the subject is pursued. To justify the claim set up over the persons of the people, the Secretary of War tells us, that "the conservation of the State is a duty paramount to all others;" that, therefore, "the Commonwealth has a right to all the service of its citizens." Does "the conservation of the State" depend alone on "the service" of its citizens? Is money, justly termed the sinews of war, not equally necessary to render that "service" beneficial? Are the "citizens" to be coerced into the field to perish for want of subsistence, or to fall before the enemy for want of the necessary means of defence? If "the conservation of the State" will warrant you to coerce "the service of the citizens," when you are destitute of men, and cannot get the requisite number in any other way, it will surely warrant you to coerce their money, when the same necessity exists, as indispensable to the attainment of the same end.

DECEMBER, 1814.

Militia Draughts.

H. OF R.

We are further informed, from the same quarter, that "it would be absurd to suppose that Congress could not carry this power (to raise and support armies) into effect otherwise than by accepting the voluntary service of individuals." "It might happen that an army could not be raised in that mode, whence the power would have been granted in vain." The position here assumed, is, that all the means that will give effect to any of the delegated powers, of whatever character, are within the control of Congress, if, without the means proposed to be employed, the power could not be executed at the time, to the extent required by public exigencies, "real or pretended." Hence it clearly follows, that, whenever money cannot be obtained by voluntary loans, when the Government is hard pressed, the power "to borrow money" may be executed by compelling individuals to loan; otherwise, "the power would have been granted in vain." Apply this monstrous principle to the present state of things in this country. Your Treasury is exhausted. There is at this moment a deficit of many millions. Your soldiers are unpaid; your militia, in the inclement season of Winter, are discharged without money enough to defray their expenses to their homes. You have used every effort to borrow money, in the ordinary mode, "in vain." You have not been able to obtain sufficient to discharge the interest of the public debt, and save the Treasury notes falling due from being dishonored. In truth, the Government is on the verge of bankruptcy! Now, with this convenient power at your command, why not borrow money at the point of the bayonet? If you do not, the power to borrow has "been granted in vain." Nay, why not, if this mode should fail, take the people's property to "support your armies," or sell it under the hammer, and give the owner a certificate for the proceeds, as for so much money borrowed? Should you want precedents for such atrocious acts, you would find them in the history of the same despotic Governments whose examples have been cited by gentlemen on this floor to prove the right and propriety of coercing American freemen into the ranks of your army.

The honorable gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. WEBSTER) has also most clearly demonstrated, that, if the construction given to the Constitution by the Secretary of War is correct, you have the power to take by violence the ships of your merchants, and convert them into ships of war, and man your Navy by impressment. The conclusion of the honorable gentleman is inevitable, admitting the Secretary's reasoning. The power "to provide and maintain a navy" is wholly unrestricted. "The conservation of the State" may, and in reality does, depend as much on a competent naval as on a land force; and, therefore, the same principle which sanctions coercion to raise an army, will bear you out in using the means stated "to provide a navy." Yet, the same person who has attempted to impose the doctrine upon this body, that every man in the nation can be coerced into the Army, has, on another occasion, denied that a single citizen could be impressed into the Navy. In the instructions to our Ministers, appointed to negotiate a treaty with Great Britain, which he composed as Secretary of State, he says, that "impressment is not an American practice, but utterly repugnant to our Constitution and laws." What must every impartial man think of such morality? When one object is sought to be effected, it is asserted that coercion is "utterly repugnant to our Constitution;" when another is desirable, we are told that "it would be absurd to doubt the right to employ it to every possible extent." Or, are seamen exempt from your power, and landmen only subject to it? Surely no such absurdity as this will be insisted on.

The practice of impressment, as exercised over her seafaring subjects by Great Britain, has been for years a fruitful theme of declamation in this House and elsewhere. The incessant efforts that were made to irritate the people against this crying iniquity, as it was characterized, was not among the least of the causes which exasperated the public feeling, and prepared the country for hostilities. The sufferings of the incarcerated seamen in "the floating dungeons of England" haunted the imaginations of a certain class of politicians, and seemed to be the sole object of all their sympathies. Little did they suppose, that, in a very short time, it would become convenient for them to claim and execute this abhorred and despotic power over their own people. Gentlemen ought to take back the reproaches and denunciations against this practice, since they have become convinced that it is nothing more than a legitimate right, necessary to "the conservation of the State." Unless, indeed, there is a distinction between the sufferings of him who is torn from his family and friends, and immured in one of the "floating dungeons of England," and him who shall be taken by like violence, and under like circumstances, and confined in an American ship of war.

Sir, if in the execution of the powers expressly confided to this Government, you have the right to use arbitrary and despotic means to obtain the end, what will prevent you from imprisoning, for life, the man on whom you shall impose a capitation tax, which he is unable to pay? Or what will prevent you from selling him as a slave in the market, to obtain the money which you may levy on him, when his poverty denies you the means of enforcing payment in any other manner?

Congress are authorized, by the Constitution, to define and punish certain crimes. They have, moreover, the power to create offences and provide for their punishment, as necessary sanctions to their laws. In neither of these cases is their discretion expressly limited. But can they, therefore, direct that the accused shall be put to the rack, and that his confessions, extorted under the torture, shall be evidence to prove his guilt? If all these things can be done by this Government, without transcending its Constitutional limits, then has the blood of the Revolution flowed in vain—then was the manly and patriotic resistance made by the Father of American Independence, to the claims of Great Britain, worse than useless—then was the solicitude of the framers of our Constitution, to “secure to themselves and posterity the blessings of liberty,” wholly unavailing.

What becomes of the authority of the States, if the omnipotent power ascribed to this Government properly belongs to it? It will be a mere shadow—an empty name. You have already given capacity to persons under age to enlist in your armies, against the consent of their parents, guardians, or masters, while under the laws of the States they are incapable of making any contract. What prevents you from giving the same capacity to slaves, that they may become soldiers? There is no distinction in principle, and certainly none in reason. The incapacity of infants and slaves depends alike on the municipal laws of the States. Those who authorized the son, in the giddy moments of youth and indiscretion, to be torn from the bosom of his parents, will surely not stickle for the rights of the master, to secure to him his property in his slave.

It is not only in these instances that the power of the States will be subverted, but the great principles of society, resting on municipal institutions, must be wholly overthrown. Let me state one or two examples. If you have the right to raise an army in any way which is calculated to attain the object, then you have the right to defeat the criminal justice of the States, by absolving from punishment those accused or convicted of crimes, on condition they enter your army. You may change the course of descents, and repeal the statutes of wills, by holding out the inducements to recruits that the sole inheritance of their ancestors' property shall belong to them, and that their right shall not be defeated by any testamentary disposition. Is there a man who, in the face of this people, dare assert that such powers belong to this Government? And yet they unquestionably do, if it is correct that the power “to raise an army” is subject to no restriction.

In relation to the militia, pretensions equally exorbitant have been advanced on the part of those in power. They are considered under the absolute control of this Government, to be called forth when it may think proper, in any number, to be employed in any service, and retained for any period. Nothing can be more incorrect in principle, and more dangerous in practice, to this community, than this assumption. It effectually prostrates the State sovereignties, and destroys the security of the people from oppressive military service. To me it seems evident that the general power over the militia was intended, by the authors of the Constitution, to remain with the States, while a special power, arising out of, and limited by, certain emergencies, was confided to this Government. This is obvious to my mind, from the nature of the subject, as well as the express provisions contained in that instrument. The enlightened men, on whose labors depended the fate of their country, understood the nature of man, his thirst for dominion, and the character and tendency of human institutions; they knew that political power, without physical means to secure it, and give it effect, was a mere mockery. Is it reasonable, therefore, to suppose that, while they transferred a portion only of the whole sovereignty to the United States, they intended to invest them with an absolute control over all the physical means of the community? What will be the condition of the States, should this construction obtain? They will be at the mercy of this Government. The most palpable infraction of their rights must be submitted to. Aggression will succeed aggression, until consolidation shall terminate even the appearance of State authority. Sir, very different opinions were entertained in this country at the time the Constitution was adopted. It was considered (as is evident from a work of high celebrity written at the time) that the States were independent political bodies, whose powers and means afforded the best security against the encroachments of the General Government, and who would employ force, if necessary to resist such encroachments, whenever they should be seriously attempted.* How, I ask, can the States resist usurpation, if we possess a supreme and general power over the militia? They may, indeed, call them to their aid to maintain the remnant of sovereignty; but such call will be nugatory. The United States (according to the doctrine of the day) may at any moment assume the control over them, and place them into their service, in which situation they are under the sole command of this Government, and subject to the rules and articles of war. Should any of them refuse to be employed, to further the projects of ambition, and to prostrate the authority of their native State, punishment for mutiny awaits them. The minions of power will be ready to execute upon them the despotic provisions of military law.

* The following is an extract from the forty-sixth number of the Federalist, written by Mr. Madison:

“But ambitious encroachments of the Federal Government, on the authority of the State governments, would not excite the opposition of a single State, or a few States only. They would be signals of general alarm. Every Government would espouse the common cause. A correspondence would be opened. Plans of resistance would be concerted. One spirit would animate and conduct the whole. The same combination, in short, would result from an apprehension of the Federal, as was produced by the dread of a foreign yoke; and unless the projected innovation should be voluntarily renounced, the same appeal to a trial of force would be made in the one case as was made in the other.”

There are other considerations which strongly tend to establish that the general power over the militia was deemed essential to the security of the State. They are prohibited in time of peace from keeping in their service any regular force; yet it is indispensable to their own existence that they should possess military means to maintain their own authority, to suppress conspiracies and insurrections, and to repel invasions when suddenly made, or when the United States have not provided a force competent to resist the invader. How, I ask, can these objects be effected, if the militia can, at the discretion of this Government, be withdrawn from their control?

What I have said hitherto on this part of the subject has arisen from the character of the American confederacy. My object was to show that as the whole sovereignty was divided between the States and the United States, so a division of the means to maintain each in its portion, would be a just inference deducible from those premises. That as the United States had general (and in time of peace exclusive) power to raise armies to effect the objects, it was rational to infer that a general power over the militia remained with the States, as necessary to the attainment of their ends. I will now beg leave to request your attention to the express provisions of the Constitution on this subject.

When that instrument was formed, it will be recollected that the sole power over the militia was vested in the States. By the Confederation they were enjoined "to keep up a well regulated militia;" but no authority to employ them was granted to the United States in any event. They were, in every sense of the term, "the militia of the States." In this situation of things, while the power of the States, in relation to this subject, was general and exclusive, the new Government came into existence. Its powers were composed of all powers vested in Congress under the Confederation, and a portion of those belonging to the States. To obviate the necessity of keeping up a large Military Establishment in ordinary times, the United States were empowered to call "the militia of the States" to their aid in certain sudden emergencies; to enable them to execute their laws, repel invasion, and to suppress insurrections. And as, in the performance of those duties, it was possible that the militia of different States might be brought to act together in one corps, it became important that there should be uniformity in their organization and discipline. Hence arose the power of Congress over those subjects, as necessary instruments to render the service of the militia, in the cases provided for, more effectual than could have been expected from the discordant regulations of the different States.

Thus it appears to me that the power granted to us to employ the militia is in its character qualified and contingent; always dormant and inactive, until the emergencies provided for in the Constitution give it life and vigor; while the power of the States is general and exclusive, except so far as the actual existence of these emergencies interfere. From this position it seems to me necessarily to follow, that the qualified cannot be exercised in such manner as to destroy the general power; that the proper State authorities have the unquestionable right to judge for themselves, whether the actual situation of the country demands the exercise of the qualified powers of this Government to call forth the militia. The principle is universal and applicable in all cases. Where a general right exists in one, and a qualified right in another, over the same subject, he who possesses the latter cannot be permitted to decide alone that his right attaches. If he could, his right, instead of being limited or contingent, would be absolute.

By the provisions of the bill before you, a general power over the militia is assumed. They are not to be called forth when any Constitutional emergency shall authorize their employment; but the call is immediate and peremptory; their service is not be limited by the duration of any such emergency, but by a definite and distant period, or by the discretion of the Executive. Nor is that service to be confined to the objects designated in the Constitution, but to be used for the general purposes of war. And these provisions are adopted for the avowed purpose of compelling the militia, rather than submit to the hardships created by your law, to furnish recruits for your army. It is not necessary for me to show that you have no more right to exact this commutation, than you have to demand the service from the militia.

To give some plausibility to the high-handed measures proposed during the present session, attempts have been made to depreciate the value of the militia in the public estimation. The cry has been raised that they are wholly useless and incompetent to the defence of the country. It is observed by a celebrated writer of the last century, equally distinguished for his eloquence and his knowledge of public men, and public affairs, that those whose object it is to enslave the people, first endeavor to degrade them in their own eyes. Where is our security against the usurpation of those who command the public force, if the militia is thus inefficient? It is only necessary for the people to believe the libels so industriously circulated against them, and slavery must be their lot. Sir, I believe the militia more competent to the defence of the country against the predatory warfare of the enemy than any force you can obtain. Whenever the idea shall become general that you cannot rely on the militia, and some other force shall be substituted in their stead, it will beget the same indifference among the great body of the people which exists in other countries. If you once persuade them that their services, their privations, and their blood, are wholly unavailing, do you presume that they will feel disposed to make useless sacrifices? If it was possible for you to procure a regular force of 200,000 men, on whom alone, for all military purposes, our whole reliance should be placed in this war, I do not believe that to all essential purposes the country would be better defended than it is at present. That portion of the force which would be spared from the Canadian warfare, must be distributed along our extended maritime frontier, in such manner as to occupy the most prominent and important points only. All other places must be left wholly defenceless, consequently to the enemy having the command of the water available. In such a state of things, the enemy would have only to dread the force actually embodied in the neighborhood of his attack, and make his movements accordingly. At present he knows that every man in the country is one of its legitimate defenders, upon whose services it relies. That circumstance is calculated to inspire him with a proper portion of caution, and tends to limit the extent of his incursions.

If the object of the enemy had been the conquest of our country, and if that object depended on a few great and decisive actions in the field, I admit that the militia would not be the proper kind of force to oppose to him. In such actions, discipline and experience, which the militia, from the short periods and nature of their service, cannot possess, in an eminent degree, are generally essential to victory.

We are frequently told that we oppose everything coming from the majority, and that we propose nothing calculated to save the country from the perils which surround us. This is an old and a stale accusation. As long as gentlemen are determined to disregard our counsels, how can they ask us to submit to the repeated mortifications of having our propositions rejected? On the present, as on many other occasions, however, the assertion is not founded in fact. The honorable gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. Stockton) has marked out the course for you in detail; permit me to repeat his admonitions, in substance. Abandon the project which experience has stamped with folly, of conquering Canada. Manifest a determination to defend your country by Constitutional means. Banish from you all idea of conscription to fill the ranks of your army. Inspire confidence by a just, liberal, and conciliatory policy; and I hesitate not to say that the present dangers will pass away, and that the country will remain independent and free.

I know that the situation of gentlemen in the majority is different from my own. Having by an ill-judged and unfortunate course of policy brought this nation into a condition admitted on all sides to be extremely perilous and alarming, they feel the high responsibility that awaits them, should the country perish in their hands. In the anxiety which such a situation necessarily begets, the character of the means will not be very scrupulously examined, if there is hope that they will serve the end. Something is necessary to be done. I warn gentlemen against the influence of this sentiment. It has been the bane of this country. Ever since I have had the honor of a seat in this House, it has given birth to all the measures connected with your foreign policy. The commencement of every session brought with it a deep conviction that something was necessary to be done, but it did not bring with it the lights requisite to judge correctly what it ought to be. Hence it happened that we were plunged from one difficulty into another still greater, until, at last, we find ourselves in a condition almost hopeless.

Sir, it is not my intention to menace gentlemen with the prospect of forcible opposition to their projects of coercing freemen into the ranks of the Army, but I will take the liberty to offer my admonition. Permit me to say that a period like the present, when your Treasury is exhausted; when all your operations are almost at a stand for want of means to impel them, is not the season for violent measures. Every Government becomes imbecillated when its finances become deranged; and in this Government, more than any other, money is the vital principle of action. The catastrophe which deprived Louis XVI of his life—that tremendous revolution which has been the cause of so much calamity to the whole community of civilized man—would never have happened had not France been bankrupt in her finances.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Kentucky, said:—The silence I have imposed upon myself in many discussions deemed of great importance to our country, would not now be broken, had not arguments have been used against the constitutionality and expediency of this bill. The old mournful song of “weakness and wickedness of the Administration,” at the tail of the cry of “French influence,” is still, sir, the fashionable ditty, and chanted in all, as prelude or finale of every subject. I mean not to enter into a vindication of others; believing it is incident to our nature to err, and believing that the best of our fellow-citizens, raised by the suffrages of our country into the most exalted and honorable stations, do not thereby “partake of the nature of angels,” but still remain the “seed of Abraham,” I feel disposed to admit those aberrations of the head, incident to our race; but I deny, nor can it be proved, that the hearts of this Administration can be truly assailed with any taint, or the want of honor, intrepidity, or patriotism. Their actions are tested by the applause and approbation of the great majority of our country, and prove their worth and excellence. Their virtue and talents, “fair as the moon, bright as the sun, and (to the enemies of our Union) terrible as an army with banners,” need not my advocacy. But I come to the questions. Are the provisions of this bill Constitutional? Are its exactments within the positive powers of Congress; and, if they are, is it expedient at this time?

On looking into the Constitution, I find a power given, in the eighth section, to “provide for the common defence of the United States, to raise and support armies, to provide for organizing the militia, and to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers.”

DECEMBER, 1814.

Militia Draughts.

H. OF R.

Permit me to ask. Can words make power more ample? Can language increase its attributes? Neither time, place, or occasion, limits this power. 'Tis positive—the Congress possess it, and are alone responsible for abuse of it. If, indeed, it were necessary to add to this well-defined power. I might be pardoned for quoting a statute of much greater antiquity and much higher authority, as well as more positive; a statute registered in Heaven, and recorded in the great volume of animate being, entitled Self-preservation; teaching its lessons to brutes, and lecturing man, that whenever the occasion requires it, "it is meet that some should die for the people," to prevent the whole nation from perishing. If, sir, such authorities as these fail to show the constitutionality of this bill, I confess I have none greater, and should despair of seeing the honorable opponents to it convinced by "a decree from Heaven." Sir, it is not sufficient to oppose paradoxes, sophistry, and argument, to the veritable assertions here made. Could gentlemen "burst the cerements" of reason, logic, and syllogism, they would not be able to mar the features, extenuate or shroud the meaning of those authorities; their effects must be operative, and their force irresistible.

On the expediency and present necessity of raising men for this war, will it be pardonable to dilate? To say we are opposed by an enemy, ferocious, powerful, vindictive, actively employed at this moment, in burning, plundering, robbing and murdering our fellow-citizens on seventeen hundred miles of seacoast, would be repeating what we all know to be fact; to say that we expect this enemy will be greatly augmented early in the next year, would express our belief. That our business here is to provide, as effectually as we can obtain the means, for the safety of our nation, none will deny. Who then will question the necessity of this bill, or some other equally remedial?

But, Mr. Speaker, as we advance towards this desirable object, at every step we are told of conscription; at this cabalistic word, horrors, gorgons, and dire chimeras arise and follow in its train; the separation of father, mother, wife, and child, is grouped; the tender scenes of an everlasting parting are pencilled with a master's hand, and woe, woe, woe, is portrayed with the powers of the most enchanting eloquence. My feelings were (I am not ashamed to own) in sympathetic unison with the dulcet sounds of chastened sorrow flowing from the lips of the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire, in his tale of things yet to come, his group of apprehensions. When, alas! sir, the scene changed from fancy to reality, from the visionary idea of possibility, to the melancholy, mournful catastrophes of substantial misery. What busy scene-shifter of the brain drew the curtain, and presented the cold-blooded murders, burnt and mangled corpses of Raisin, Rapids, and Brownstown, the conflagrations and sacking of Black Rock, Havre de Grace, Washington, and every assailable part of the Chesapeake and its tributary streams! Here, indeed, we might rally, sir—the weeping mother, the orphan, the murdered or imprisoned father or son, the hoary head and green youth, robbed, plundered, imprisoned or murdered, by that infamous enemy who never spared when his avarice or violence were his dictators.

If this recital excites horror; if it would make the swords of freemen fly from their scabbards, to repress and chastise a foe so barbarous, let me ask what additional feeling would edge them? There is existing, sir, a tale, yet untold; the scenes were laid at Hampton, in Virginia, and St. Ingoes, in Maryland; a tale too horrid, too shocking, to bear expression here; a tale that would freeze your blood, excite your vengeance, and make you, like Hannibal, swear eternal enmity to the name of Briton; a tale that would make angels weep, and excite tender emotions from fiends; a tale, the truth of which is unquestionable, passing almost within sight and sound of your Capitol; a tale, repeated but the last week at Tappahannock, which plainly proves it the deliberate purpose of our enemy to persist. This tale, sir, will, I hope, reconcile gentlemen to the objects of this bill, and convince them of its expediency. Let them not be affrighted by the word conscription; it is older than the oldest man here; well do I remember it fifty-seven years ago. Then, sir, I saw and recollected the parting of husband and wife, father and son. The occasion required it; the savage was upon the borders, and must be repelled; none murmured. In the war of the Revolution, this same conscription, or draught, which are but words to designate the details for military duty, saved your country. After the reverses in '76, on Long and York Islands, Fort Washington, &c., had almost destroyed every appearance of resisting further the arms of the foe; at a time when even hope was only kept alive and cherished by the example of that exalted man who led the feeble resistance of his country; then, sir, at that hour of alarm and peril, the force raised by conscription saved us; and at every period through that eventful war, we know and feel its efficacy. Sir, when I hear it asserted here, that this law cannot be executed, the Eastern States will revolt, they will not submit to be detailed for the defence of this nation, of which they are a part, I feel astonished. Can you believe these assertions? What, sir! can it be credited that the sons, the offspring of those immortal bands who in 1775 first taught our enemy the might and prowess of freemen, and all America the true principles and value of liberty; who said to Britain, "the soil is our own, and you tread not on it but by permission," and who have gone down into the dust, mature in years and ripe in honors; will their descendants, pious, learned, industrious, and patriotic, wage war against their Government, because of the new exposition of a phrase, or definition of a word, in a law prescribing the means of safety, at this hour of extreme danger? Gentlemen must pardon me for not admitting conclusions so uncharitable (I had almost said) so invidious, from their premises; it is not possible.

Mr. IRVING, of New York, spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, it appears to me, that the nice distinctions, that have heretofore been made, between a defensive and an offensive war, are no longer of any consequence. The ground on which the war commenced, can no longer, it is presumed, affect the question, whether hostilities shall be carried on with every efficient means within our power. The terms proposed by the British Commissioners have been communicated to this House; and the question now is, whether these terms are to be accepted, or, whether we are to employ the means Providence has placed within our reach in the expectation of procuring better?

Sir, I would ask any gentleman in this Assembly, whether he is willing to accept of these terms—to dismember the territory of the United States, to lop off the hands and arms of this country, and thus deliver her a prey to the enemy; or, at any rate, take from her every future hope of obtaining either satisfaction for injuries, or security against the exercise of oppression on the ocean? If he says he is willing to do this, it is well; he takes this stand, and we know what he means by opposing this measure. But if, on the other hand, by a feeling of generous indignation at these new and unwarrantable claims, that violate the integrity of this country, and outrage every principle of reciprocity, he answers, that he will not make peace on such ignoble terms; then, if he differs with me, it is only as to the expediency of this measure, or its capacity to answer the purpose for which it is intended. It is with a view of investigating these two points that I enter into this debate; for I do not believe there is any honorable gentleman in this House who would recommend a peace on the terms which have been offered. If there is, I should consider it idle to address myself to such a person. It is impossible to create a soul under the ribs of death—and I would consider it equally hopeless to reason against the want of certain feelings, or attempt to excite emotions in a breast steeled by insensibility.

I would, then, ask, are the present means of raising an army adequate to the exigencies of the present crisis? No, sir. The history of the war, and the experience of every day, are a sufficient answer to this question. What with the habits engendered by a long peace—the want of means to pay the enormous bounties, which are necessary to tempt the prosperous multitude of this country—and, most of all, the various and unjustifiable means that have been resorted to, for the purpose of impeding or discouraging enlistments, it is found totally impossible to fill the ranks of the Army. Are the militia ordered out? It is called oppression. Are they selected by lot? Gentlemen cry out conscription—as if there was any analogy between the temperate behests of the law, and the arbitrary will of a despot. Should any man be willing to enlist voluntarily, he is told, that his pay will be withheld, for that, in New England, several soldiers have sold their certificates at a loss of fifty per cent. And this fact, which, if it be true, was the result of a panic arising from the suggestions of some patriotic adviser, or conscientious broker, who wished to take advantage of his credulity, is trumpeted from one end of the country to the other—hawked about in newspapers, and recorded in triumph by the friends of their country.

What then remains for us, sir? Are we to go on in this miserable ricketty mode of warfare to the end of time, and waste our resources by dribbets, in this preposterous economy—this lady-like forbearance of using the means in our power? Or are we, by one manly and decisive effort, to do that at once, which we must do at last, or submit to a most dishonorable peace? This is not the land of Colchis—you cannot sow dragons' teeth and reap armed men; you must resort to human means—and all human means, hitherto tried, have failed; we must, therefore, find others, or we must crouch and cringe, and say to the enemy, in the debased and whining language of cowardice, "take all we have, but spare our lives."

Sir, as a means of raising an efficient army, I see nothing unconstitutional or illegal in the bill before us, nor, indeed, any very extraordinary hardship. If the country is worth defending, and I do trust some part of it, at least, will be considered so, there appears no very good reason why men should not be called upon to perform that duty. The framers of this Constitution thought so, and they invested the General Government with the power of calling out the militia, as a sufficient defence against any force that might be brought against us. If, sir, this resource is withheld by the delicate scruples of some State authorities—if pretence, or construction, or quibble is resorted to—or if men shelter themselves behind an ambiguity, are the country, the lakes, and our honor, to be sacrificed in consequence? I hope not—I trust not—I am sure not. I do believe there is spirit enough in this House to resist both foreign and domestic foes, and energy sufficient to surmount the imaginary barriers of the Constitution, which rather seem to invite the aggressions of the enemy than to afford safety to those whom this very Constitution was intended to protect.

I say imaginary barriers, because I see nothing in the Constitution which opposes this classification. It is true, sir, I am no lawyer, expert in legal subtleties, and equally expert in applying either end of the glass to an object, as it suits his purpose, to increase or diminish it. But there is one rule of law, to which I have not been inattentive, and that is, to consult the intention of the law which we are to expound. What was the intention of that section of the Constitution which provides for calling out the militia; in short, sir, what was the whole object of the Constitution itself? It was framed solely for the purpose of combining the people of the United States into a community for mutual defence. If, therefore, the usual resource of militia is insufficient, we resort to regular enlistment; and if that fails, what are we to do but try more efficient means, or surrender the honor, and barter the interests of the country for imaginary Constitutional scruples?

Sir, there is one political axiom that cannot be controverted; the country must be defended; and whether this is done by drawing the enemy to a distance, or receiving him at our doors, is a matter of policy, and not of conscience. It does not alter the principle one single hair's breadth. For my part, sir, I cannot find in the Constitution any one principle that militates against classification any more than against a draught, or conscription, as some gentlemen call it. If there was, cases might occur, even then, to justify such a measure, as indispensable to self defence, which, while that necessity lasts, supersedes all other laws but those of nature.

But it appears to me, that sometimes we "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel." There is a fundamental principle in the Constitution which requires the minority to submit to the will of the majority, constitutionally expressed—yet some in our country have forgotten that; there is another, that "no State shall enter into compact with another State"—some have quite forgotten that; and there is a sacred principle of union pervading every article of the Constitution—and some have quite forgotten that.

No! Mr. Speaker, having so glorious an inheritance, equal to that promised land that the Jews were forty years suffering in the wilderness in the hope of obtaining, is it not wonderful, that instead of devising ways and means for defending and securing the precious possession, we should be seeking for quibbles to render useless the means that God has provided for its defence?

Sir, we hear the Executive of the United States every day charged with incapacity in carrying on the war; but how could we have expected anything else, when we take into consideration the situation in which he has been placed? Instead of providing money by taxation, we chose to resort to the expedient of loans, and sent our Government out borrowing, until they returned penniless. The consequence has been, that instead of employing their time the Summer past in devising plans how they could most annoy the enemy, they have been scuffling with national penury—perplexed to know, from day to day, how they could employ to the best advantage their stinted means—how they could exist from hour to hour, with an exhausted Treasury, and a depreciated credit. It is in vain to expect a well-conducted war and an efficient Administration, unless we provide money and men to produce both.

Sir, gentlemen talk of this General Government as if it were a self-supported superior being; some abstract and independent power; some cloud-en-throned Hercules, on whom we are to depend for overcoming our difficulties, without any exertion of our own. What is the Government of the United States, but an aggregate of the physical power and wealth of the people at large? It is from those it derives its strength and its energy; and if those are withheld, I, for one, should like to know what means gentlemen would propose for the purpose of supplying that strength and energy. Sir, you might as well wither this arm by a powerful spell, and stop the current of blood that flows in these veins, and then, when the arm was rendered powerless, and the heart ceased to beat, deride the body for being inert and motionless.

There is but one way of giving energy to a free Government that I know of, and that is by being liberal, not reckless, of the public resources; and it is the special duty of this House, charged as it is with that distribution, to be careful, while it guards the public wealth from waste, and the people of this free country from oppression, to give to the Government the means of being strong and energetic.

If we refuse these means, the gentlemen on the other side, who, after having clamored for taxes as they did for war, and afterwards voted against both, may, if they please, charge the Administration with not being energetic; they may attempt to lift the load of responsibility from themselves, but it will cling to them with the pertinacity of some natural deformity; and, though they may perchance deceive themselves, those who trace effects right home to their true causes, will point to this House, which, with a most prodigal economy, refused to bestow, what it was content the Government should borrow, at a rate of interest beyond what any individual who was not desperate in fortune and reputation ever paid.

I came not here, sir, as the advocate of any Administration whatever, but as an agent from the part of the country I represent to promote, according to the best of my judgment, the public good. Still, I think it the part of every honest man to vindicate the rulers of his free choice, when he thinks they are unjustly calumniated. Neither do I impeach any man's motives in saying, that when gentlemen accuse the Executive with want of energy, they may as well go a little further, and accuse the body of not taking care of the limbs, when the limbs have refused to do their office.

It is this mistaken, this fatal economy, that accounts for the ill conduct of the war, of which gentlemen every day, and on all occasions, complain. No matter what may be the subject before us, we are condemned on every question to hear a repetition of the same arguments. The clock does not strike, or the sentinel walk his rounds, more regularly than some gentlemen go the sing-song round of "unjust, unnecessary, and unnatural war." They are continually reminding us of the unfortunate cook, who, for want of a little genius to diversify his dinners, every day served up the same dull round of "three roasted pigs, three buttered apple pies." Whenever they are asked for men or money, they either fly out into a passion and scold the Administration roundly, or they resort to as many excuses as a miser dunned for some miserable pittance. One gentleman will not give his money, because his section of the Union is not represented in the Committee of Ways and Means. Why, sir, this is the first time that I have ever heard the doctrine of the union of taxation and representation narrowed down to such miserable localities. If such a principle is to be introduced into this House, there is not a measure that may not be opposed on this ground. Every State must be represented in each committee; and the jostling of local interests, local prejudices, and local partialities, would in all probability most effectually prevent any well digested report from ever being made to this House.

Sir, it is here, on this floor, that the final decision on every report is made; and, so long as any member of this House can here freely deliver his sentiments and utter his objections in language that suits either the suavity or malignity of his own disposition, it does appear to me a matter of perfect indifference whether his section of the Union is represented in the committee or not.

Sir, I repeat again, it is this mistaken economy which, by withholding what is necessary, renders what it bestows almost useless, that accounts for the alleged bad conduct of the war, on which the gentlemen dwell with such wonderful and incessant pertinacity. Not having money, the Government could not procure men; and not having men, they could not undertake any extensive and splendid enterprise. And this, in my opinion, is all the bad conduct that can be properly charged upon the Administration. Even thus circumscribed by our jealous economy, what one advantage has the enemy gained, except the solitary one of injuring this capital? And that, in a national point of view, as affecting the spirit of the nation, has been rather a good than an evil. Something was necessary to rouse the dormant spirit of the nation, and this has effectually done it. But even this disaster is to be attributed to our own imprudence—not in expending but withholding the public resources. The want of money, so imperiously felt at the Treasury, which prevented the raising of men, prevented the possibility of having a sufficient force ready to repel the enemy at every avenue of attack; it prevented the erecting of necessary fortifications at every vulnerable point; and it prevented the doing anything, until the dangers of the moment called the attention of the Government to act.

Unable to obtain means for expenditures that were absolute in their demand, such as the subsistence of troops, the supplying arms, ammunition, ordnance, clothing, &c., for those already employed, and for erecting fortifications where it was conceived they were immediately wanted, those contingencies that were apparently remote were not taken into consideration; they were of necessity neglected; and hence the opportunity given to the enemy to make an incursion into this place; and here we are to look for the cause of the inefficiency of the present Administration. We did not provide in time the means to enable them to be efficient; and any Administration would have been inefficient under similar circumstances.

I urge these remarks on this House, considering it a thinking, reflecting, body; a co-ordinate branch of the Government; and equally bound with the Executive, in the laws that are framed, to consult the interests and promote the safety of the people. When, therefore, we accuse the Executive of not performing what we did not afford him the means to perform, we either treat him unjustly, or we virtually declare ourselves mere automations, to be directed by his will, which is notoriously not the case. Sir, let us try to do better in future. Let us provide ample means to insure success, and then, and not till then, can we hold the Executive responsible for disaster and disgrace.

Sir, this is not a time to talk, but to act. When our Army is composed of a mere handful of men, and our Treasury empty, so that it cannot provide for this gallant handful; when an enemy, powerful and active, is beating against our shores like the strong wave of the ocean; when everything is at stake; when personal safety, property, and everything valuable, and everything dear to us, lie all exposed to the mercy of momentary events; and when, in the language of Scripture, we may emphatically say, "we know not what a day may bring forth," surely, such is not the moment for parsimonious feelings in raising taxes, or for forced constructions to defeat the means for raising men. If we are parsimonious now, the next year everything is to be done over again; the same expense is to be repeated, and the same result ensues. Sir, this is the way to exhaust a country without producing one single good. It renders her sacrifices of no avail; it is offering up victims without a hope that the offering will be accepted; it is bleeding a little every day, till the patient is exhausted, while the disease remains.

The motion was further opposed by Messrs. FORSYTH, TROUP and BRADLEY, and advocated by Mr. GROSVENOR.

After refusing several times to adjourn, the question on the motion for indefinite postponement was decided as follows:

Two or three ineffectual attempts were then made to adjourn.

The question being then stated on concurring in the first amendment to the bill, as agreed to in Committee of the Whole, which amendment authorizes the President to call directly on the officers of militia in case of the refusal of the Governors of the States to aid in the execution of the law—

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, spoke a short time in opposition to it.

The question was then taken on concurring in this amendment, and agreed to—For the amendment 87, against it 42, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. The question, on a motion of Mr. MILLER, to adjourn (at 6 o'clock) was then taken by yeas and nays—for the motion 53, against it 75.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, then moved to postpone the bill and amendments to Monday.—Negatived.

The House then proceeded to consider and separately to agree to all the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole. That amendment made in the Committee of the Whole, on motion of Mr. EPPES, to reduce the term of service of the militia to be draughted from two years to one year, was agreed to by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Barbour, Bard, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bradbury, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Burwell, Butler, Caperton, Cannon, Clopton, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Desha, Ely, Eppes, Fisk of Vermont, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Goodwyn, Grosvenor, Hale, Harris, Hawes, Henderson, Humphreys, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of Mary-

A motion was then made by Mr. MACON, further to amend the first section of the bill, by striking out the quotas assigned to each of the States, and, in lieu thereof, to insert:

From Massachusetts	-	-	-	10,036

And the yeas and nays having been required on this motion, the House at length adjourned, a little before 8 o'clock, after a sitting of nearly ten hours.

MONDAY, December 12.

A new member, to wit: from Pennsylvania, AMOS SLAYMAKER, appeared, produced his credentials, and took his seat, in the place of James Whitehill, resigned; the oath to support the Constitution of the United States being first administered to him.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, presented the petition of sundry merchants, and other citizens of New York, praying for the establishment of a general bankrupt law; which was read.

Mr. T. said, he had desired the reading of this memorial, for the purpose of calling the attention of the House more particularly to a subject of the utmost importance. Among the signatures to that petition were the names of persons who had contributed millions to the revenue, and of others who had, within a short time, bestowed thousands of dollars on charitable institutions; men than whom there were none more respectable in the nation. They look to Congress alone for relief from the difficulties into which they have been plunged by the recent embarrassments of commerce; by whom alone they can be relieved, if the recent decision of the circuit court of Pennsylvania be confirmed, &c. He, therefore, moved that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.—Agreed to.

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to provide additional revenue for defraying the expenses of the Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax within the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same; twice read, and committed.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of J. C. Hurlburt having been reported without amendment, was ordered to a third reading.

The House then took up for consideration the amendments of the Senate to the carriage duty bill; which were agreed to.

DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the amendments of the Senate to the bill laying a duty on distilled spirits, made a report thereon. Several of the amendments having been agreed to, the question was then stated on agreeing to that amendment of the Senate, which proposes to strike out the section allowing distillers to sell any quantity not less than one gallon of the liquor they distil.

[The section thus proposed to be struck out of the bill was originally inserted, in the House, at the suggestion of Mr. GHOLSON, of Virginia, who, with others, contended that the law, as it now stood, had a most inconvenient and even oppressive operation on the people in the particular part of the country in which he resided, many of whom did not distil to the quantity which they are by law allowed to dispose of, and who were now precluded from selling enough of the liquor they distil, to enable them to pay the tax on it.]

The proposition to strike out this section was opposed by Mr. GHOLSON and Mr. EPPES, Mr. MCKEE of Kentucky, Mr. MACON of North Carolina, Mr. RHEA of Tennessee, Mr. PICKENS of North Carolina, and Mr. INGHAM of Pennsylvania; and supported by Mr. MCKIM of Maryland, Mr. WARD and Mr. JOHN REED, of Massachusetts, Mr. FISK of New York, and Mr. POTTER.

The question on concurring in the amendment, which goes to strike out this section, was decided in the negative by yeas and nays, which exhibited the following result: For the amendment 71, against it 81, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Avery, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Bines, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Butler, Champion, Cilley, Comstock, Cox, Crawford, Dana, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Denoyelles, Ely, Fisk of New York, Geddes, Glasgow, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Hale, Hasbrouck, Henderson, Howell, Ingersoll, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Markell, McKim, Miller, Moore, Moseley, Oakley, Pickering, Potter, John

Reed, William Reed, Rich, Robertson, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Shipherd, Smith of New York, Stockton, Sturges, Taggart, Taylor, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, Williams, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, and Wright.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Caperton, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Chappell, Clark, Clopton, Conard, Creighton, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Findley, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Ingham, Irwin, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kerr, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Leferts, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McLean, Montgomery, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Pearson, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Roane, Sage, Sevier, Sharp, Sheffey, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Stuart, Tannehill, Telfair, Troup, Udree, White, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Yancey.

All the amendments (this one excepted) were agreed to, and the bill returned to the Senate.

DESTRUCTION OF BOOKS AND PAPERS.

Mr. PEARSON, of North Carolina, from the select committee, to whom was referred the letter of Patrick Magruder, respecting the destruction of the library and papers belonging to the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, made a report thereon, exhibiting a detailed view of the circumstances attending the loss of the library, which the committee conceive might have been preserved in whole or in part, and the vouchers for the contingent expenditures of the House of Representatives; and concluding with a resolution, that he be credited with a certain sum, ascertained to have been expended by him between the 14th January, 1814, and the day on which the Capitol was destroyed by the enemy. The report was read by Mr. P. in his place, and ordered to be printed. It is as follows:

That the committee have satisfactory evidence that the library of Congress, consisting of volumes agreeably to the catalogue herewith submitted, was destroyed by the enemy on the 24th of August last; and, also, the manuscript records, papers, and secret journals of Congress, mentioned in the communication submitted to this committee. In addition to the ascertainment of those facts, the committee have considered it their duty to form and express some opinion as to the degree of diligence and precaution exercised by the Clerk, and those in his employ, to prevent the loss which has been sustained. In doing this they have taken into consideration the threatening aspect of the enemy in the Chesapeake, the Potomac, and the Patuxent, almost uniformly from the month of June to the period of their incursion on the city of Washington, and the apprehension which prevailed on this subject, as developed by the committee appointed to inquire into the "causes of the success of the enemy in his recent enterprises against this metropolis," &c. They have also referred to the several Heads of Departments, and obtained information as to the time and manner of their removing and securing the papers and effects belonging to their offices; which information the committee herewith submit as part of their report, contained in the letters marked Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4; from which it appears that measures, preparatory to a removal of the documents belonging to the several Departments, were taken as early as the 20th and 21st of August, and the removals all effected by the 22d; whereas no preparatory measures were taken to secure the library and papers appertaining to the office of the House of Representatives, or any efforts made to procure the means of transportation till the afternoon of the 22d of August; after which time the committee were convinced that the means of transportation were difficult to obtain, if not impracticable.

As to the absence of the Clerk on account of indisposition, as alleged, the committee have not examined as to the particular nature and extent of that indisposition. They will only say that it was, or ought to have been, serious and alarming, to have justified his absence under the circumstances which then existed. The committee are, therefore, constrained to express the opinion, that due precaution and diligence were not exercised to prevent the destruction and loss which has been sustained.

In relation to the remaining subject of inquiry submitted to the committee, viz: the amount of money paid on account of the contingent expenses of the House, since the first of January last, for which the Clerk ought to be credited, (the original vouchers having been destroyed in the conflagration of the Capitol,) the committee have no reason to disbelieve the statement of the Clerk, and his deputies, as to the destruction of the vouchers alluded to. They have, however, experienced much difficulty, delay, and embarrassment, in their endeavors to ascertain and adjust the accounts of the Clerk, so as to do justice between the public and the individual. This task was the more arduous and unpleasant, from the circumstance of the Clerk himself disavowing any knowledge of the pecuniary transactions of his office, and referring the committee to his chief clerk, Colonel George Magruder, who, on application, appeared equally unable or unwilling to enter into such a specification of the accounts and expenditures as would enable the committee to form any probable result. He presented a general statement, (herewith submitted, marked M,) by which it appeared that the Clerk of the House of Representatives stood charged on the books of the Treasury with the sum of $50,863 16, and that he claimed credit for $48,000, for expenditures for contingent expenses of the House, from January, 1814, to 23d August of the same year; leaving a balance due the United States, on that day, of $2,863 16. The committee considering this alleged amount of expenditure as being very great and unprecedented, for the same length of time, and presuming, as the Clerk was able to state a particular sum expended, and a small amount remaining in his hands on the day his vouchers were destroyed, he might, from the same data which produced the results stated, by the aid of his recollection, the assistance of the clerks in his office, and the officers of the House, and especially by reference to the bank or banks in which his public deposits were kept, and individuals to whom the principal payments were made, furnish such specific statements as would have enabled the committee to form a reasonable opinion as to the correctness of the general statement which had been presented, they deemed it their duty to require a statement of the principal items of ordinary expenditure, and the names of persons who had furnished them; this information was ultimately obtained by the admission of the chief clerk, the information of other officers of the House, and the knowledge which the committee themselves had of the most considerable objects of expenditure. All of which are stated in the account herewith presented, marked A. The Clerk was then requested to ascertain, from such sources as seem practicable, the sums paid on account of those several items of expenditure; some of which they know he could ascertain with certainty, and most of which with probable accuracy. In compliance with this request the committee were furnished with the statement marked B.; the principal items of which are—

To paying Messrs Way and Weightman, for printing and stationery	- - -	$25,600 10
To paying messengers of the House	- - -	2,584 50

The committee having obtained from the Treasury Department a copy of the last settlement made by the Clerk, on the 14th January, 1814, on account of the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives, and having examined the books of Messrs. Way and Weightman, as also the cashiers of the Bank of Washington and the Union Bank of Georgetown, are satisfied that the sum of $3,539 53 ought to be deducted from the $25,600 10, charged for printing and stationery in the account rendered by the clerks, and marked B, as aforesaid. The same having, in the opinion of the committee, been already allowed, and included in the settlement with the Treasury on the 14th of January, 1814; which settlement the committee herewith submit, marked T.

The charge in account B, for the pay of messengers for the House, is manifestly incorrect, and exceeds their proper allowance by the sum of $518 55.

The committee having allowed all other charges specified and claimed by the Clerk, and having, by every means in their power, ascertained the items with which the contingent fund is chargeable, and made the most liberal allowance for its expenditure, submit the statement, marked A, as the result of their inquiry.

From which it appears that, on settlement with the Treasury, on the 14th January, 1814, a balance remained in the hands of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, due the U. States, of $6,574 87. That, from the 14th of January, 1814, to the 18th April, 1814, the Clerk drew from the Treasury the sum of - - - 44,288 29

Making the sum of - - - $50,863 16 with which he now stands charged at the Treasury.

That his expenditures since the above settlement, and such as the committee presume were not included in it, on account of the contingent expenses of the House, to the 19th September, 1814, amount to the sum of - - - 30,933 57½

Leaving a balance unaccounted for by the Clerk, and due the United States, of $19,929 58

The committee recommend the following resolution:
Resolved, That Patrick Magruder, Clerk of the House of Representatives, be credited at the proper office of the Treasury Department with the sum of $30,933 57½, for expenditures on account of the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives, from the date of his last settlement to the 19th September, 1814.

DECEMBER, 1814.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 5, 1814.

SIR: Upon inquiry, I find that the books and papers appertaining to the Treasury were packed up on Sunday, the 21st of August, 1814, and sent off in the afternoon of the following day.

It is also stated to me that much difficulty was not experienced in procuring carriages to transport the books and papers; and that, in fact, two wagons, more than were eventually found necessary, were engaged by the Department.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

JOSEPH PEARSON, Esq.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Nov. 21, 1814.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 21st instant, inquiring at what time the papers belonging to the Department of State were removed previous to the destruction of the public buildings in this city, and whether it was practicable for the Clerk of the House of Representatives to have obtained the means of removing the library and papers belonging to that House in the Capitol of the United States within the space of three days previous to that event.

Having left this city on the Thursday preceding the 24th of August for the neighborhood of Benedict, and having entered it afterwards, momentarily only, prior to the 24th, I have no knowledge, from personal observation, of the means which might have been obtained by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, for the removal of the library and documents of that branch of the Legislature.

Apprehending, when I left the city, that the documents belonging to the Department of State would be in danger, I gave orders that they should be packed up and in readiness to be moved on notice of the approach of the enemy. It was under this order, and on the subsequent notice, which was communicated, that they were removed to a place of safety on the 22d of August.

I have understood that the papers of the Department of War were likewise removed on the 22d of August.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

Hon. JOSEPH PEARSON, H. of Reps.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 5, 1814.

SIR: In compliance with the request contained in your note of yesterday, requiring "such information as to the time when the papers of this Department were packed up and removed; and, finally, my opinion as to the practicability of obtaining the means of conveyance, for three days, immediately preceding the destruction of the Capitol by the enemy," I have the honor to represent that, having, on Saturday, the 20th August last, directed the Chief Clerk of this Department to prepare for the removal of the books, papers, and effects of the Navy Department, and to procure the necessary transportation, I now enclose his statement of the facts and circumstances attending the execution of my order, as conveying more correct information, in relation to the subject of your inquiry, than that which comes within my own knowledge.

I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

A. JONES.

Hon. JOSEPH PEARSON, Chairman, &c.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 5, 1814.

In obedience to the instructions from the Secretary of the Navy, to prepare for the removal and safety of the public documents and archives of the Navy Department, on Saturday, the 20th day of August, 1814, and anticipating a difficulty in procuring wagons, he sanctioned the transportation by water, in boats up the Potomac river.

On Sunday three of the clerks were employed packing up, in boxes and trunks, all the books of record, papers, library, maps, charts, plans, stationery, trophies, various valuable instruments, paintings, prints, &c., ready for removal on the next day; and in the evening of Sunday, the 21st of August, two river boats, with their crews, were engaged for the purpose at the ordinary pay and wages.

On Monday, the 22d August, two of the city carts were engaged, and all the boxes and articles in the Navy Department, (heavy desks and furniture excepted,) were put on board a boat at the nearest wharf to the offices, and at 4 P. M. proceeded up the river as far as Georgetown.

In the forenoon of Monday, the 22d, two large wagons with drivers presented themselves at the Department for employ, and on account of the previous arrangement to transport by water, they were transferred to the Accountant of the Navy Department, who loaded them with the effects of his office.

On Tuesday, the 23d August, the Chief Clerk, with one of the clerks of the Department, proceeded up the river Potomac, and passed through the locks and canal to a place of safety.

There was no difficulty in procuring more boats and men enough to navigate them up the river above the falls.

BENJAMIN HOMANS, *Clerk.*TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
General Land Office, November 5, 1814.

SIR: In the absence of the Commissioner I have the honor to reply to the questions in your letter of yesterday.

On the Sunday preceding the destruction of the public buildings, the records of this office were prepared for removal.

On Monday wagons were procured in the country, loaded in the evening, and the records removed the same night.

As to the practicability of obtaining the means of conveyance on other roads than that which I travelled I cannot form an opinion, but on that road I found no difficulty in procuring what I wanted for this office on that day. I am, very respectfully,

JOHN GARDINER, Chief Clerk.

Hon. J. PEARSON.

MILITIA DRAUGHTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate authorizing a draught of 80,430 militia, for the defence of the frontiers.

The motion of Mr. MACON, to place the apportionment of the draught on the basis of military strength (or free white population) instead of the basis of representation, on which it now stands, being under consideration—

Mr. KENNEDY spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I have generally contented myself with giving a silent vote on most of the subjects which have been presented to this House, after bestowing upon them the best consideration and the most mature reflection I was able to do, agreeably to the powers which it has been my lot to possess; but to remain silent on a question which involves the best interests of my constituents, as well as that of the whole Southern country, I think would be a wanton, if not a criminal neglect of duty, I must therefore beg to be excused for troubling the House with a few remarks.

Sir, I hope the amendment proposed by my honorable colleague (Mr. MAÇON) will prevail. In all coalitions or unions formed by independent sovereign Powers for the attainment of any object which required military requisitions or requisitions of money, those demands have always been made upon the principles of military strength, and the ability to pay, and not in proportion to political strength or political privileges; it is the usage and practice of the world, founded in eternal justice and plain common sense.

In the late coalition between Great Britain and the Continental Powers against the French Emperor, which resulted in the overthrow of that Monarch, why was it not required of Sweden, who possessed all the political privileges of a free and independent nation, to furnish as many troops for that object as Russia or Austria? The answer is obvious, because she was not able, her population was not equal to the task, without a great sacrifice; it could not be done without perhaps ruin and destruction to the State; justice therefore only required that the demand upon her should be made in proportion to her military strength, and in that ratio I presume her troops were furnished.

The same principle was recognised and practised by the Old Congress, under the Articles of Confederation; each State had the same political strength, as to any vote in that body, yet notwithstanding, whenever any requisition was made by them upon the States for men, it was always in proportion to the physical strength of the States respectively, and not in proportion to their political rights, as independent sovereign Powers, nor in proportion to their political strength in the General Government of the nation; and every requisition for money was made in proportion to their ability to pay, and not in any other ratio whatever.

But the gentleman from New York (Mr. FISK) contends that a call for militia is a direct tax upon the people, and ought to be apportioned among the States, respectively, according to the number of their Representatives. In this opinion, I presume, he thinks he is warranted by the second section of the first article of the Constitution, which says—"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons."

This strange and alarming doctrine I will now, sir, endeavor, to examine and refute. A call upon the States for militia is not a direct tax upon the people within the spirit and meaning of the Constitution, otherwise the tax would have to be collected, or rather, the duty would have to be performed according to representation, in the precise manner that it would be imposed; and in order to see the impropriety of the opinion contended for, we have only to look at the absurdity to which the doctrine would lead us if pursued. Suppose an attack is made by the enemy on New Orleans; according to this idea, the President would be bound to call out the whole draughted militia from every State and Territory within the Union, in order that the service should be performed in the proportion that it was imposed, although one half of the number might not be wanted for the object; or, if this plan should be considered too expensive and inconvenient to the nation, he will then be driven to the alternative of ordering out the precise number wanted for the expedition from all parts of the Union. But still it must be done according to this ratio of representation, the inevitable consequence of which would be, the place attacked would be destroyed before a sufficient force could be brought to relieve it.

If this reasoning be correct—and I presume it cannot be denied—then it must be plainly inferred, according to the doctrine contended for by that gentleman, that the President cannot with propriety order out the whole draughted militia from the States nearest to the place invaded; because, if there should be no occasion for ordering out the remainder of the requisition before a restoration of peace, the duty cannot be performed, according to representation. From which it is obvious, if this opinion is persisted in, the nation cannot be defended by the militia; and, in reality, it appears to me a vain and idle attempt, and beyond the power of man, be the events what they may in respect to invasion, considering the extent of our country and the difference in the distance each detachment has to march over, to apportion the actual service of the militia among the States according to representation, like direct taxes, or in any other precise proportion whatsoever. This subject, therefore, was, in my judgment, very properly left to the sound discretion of Congress, who, it is presumed, will lay this burden upon the States as nearly equal, upon principles of justice, as the circumstances of the country will permit; and no plan appears to me so consistent to those principles as the one which makes the apportionment according to the physical strength of each State, leaving the actual service to be controlled by future wants.

But, before I leave this point, I will take the liberty to add one more remark. Suppose the President, agreeably to his power under the act of 1795, upon a sudden and pressing emergency, calls out the whole militia en masse from one of the Northern States; I would ask any gentleman, in order to comply with this opinion, how are they to be called out in the slaveholding States, when the whole body of their militia if called upon in proportion to representation is not sufficient for the purpose. The idea really appears to me so absurd and preposterous that it will not even do to think about.

Some gentlemen, however, are of opinion that the great object of this bill is to raise forty thousand regular troops; that the militia part of it is only to coerce the people to raise the troops from the Government, and is in its spirit a direct tax upon them, and ought to be apportioned among the States according to representation. Sir, this burden, like most others, if gentlemen are disposed, may be compared to direct taxes, and although in its bearing and operation it may have the resemblance of such a tax, though not a direct tax in reality, yet it appears to me clear that if the spirit of the Constitution must be distorted for this purpose the utmost extent that gentlemen can go is to lay the additional burden upon the slaveholding States only in that proportion that the direct tax would bear to the whole revenue of the country; and I am of this opinion, because if the forty thousand troops were actually enlisted and paid by the Government, one-seventh part only of the money that would be required for that purpose would be raised from the people by direct taxes, agreeably to the system of taxation we are about to adopt the present session; then if the slaveholding States must have an extraordinary burden laid upon them, that excess of burden ought only to be one-seventh part of the difference between a calculation made upon the score of free population, and a calculation on the ground of representation, and not the whole of that difference, according to the provision of the bill which is moved to be stricken out.

But suppose in exercising the delegated power "to call forth the militia" it does not operate as a lever to the execution of another delegated power "to raise armies," in the manner as I presume was contemplated by some gentlemen, and the probability of its having that effect appears to be considerably lessened by the change the bill has undergone, in altering the term of service from two years to twelve months; then the bill will result in nothing but a plain, common militia bill, the impropriety of apportioning which among the States according to representation, under such a law, I think I have already sufficiently shown.

And I now contend, sir, that no part of this bill imposes a direct tax upon the people, within the letter, spirit, or meaning of the Constitution. I know that any inconvenience may figuratively be called a tax; but are we to impose burdens upon the people by tropes or figures, or are we bound by the principles contained in the Constitution of our country? I say that this is no direct tax; because the militia, when called into active service, receive a compensation for their trouble, and it never was known for the people to be reimbursed in a pecuniary manner by their Government for any tax imposed upon them: such an idea is totally inconsistent with the character of a direct tax.

And although a part, or the whole of the forty thousand regular troops should be raised by the provisions of the bill, it will not on that account operate as a direct tax upon the people, because they are not bound to raise them. It will be a mere voluntary act, and amounts to nothing more than a commutation with the Government for militia service—in other words, a purchase of exemption during the war, from that militia duty which, by the institutions of our country, every free man is liable to perform.

But why should we have recourse to argument to show what a direct tax is, when the Constitution itself furnishes a plain solution to the question? The 8th section of the 1st article says, "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States." From the plain import and meaning of these words, nothing properly can be understood, but a grant of power to raise money, and a specification of the purposes to which it should be applied. But, sir, if the idea of the gentleman from New York is a correct one, that a call of the militia is a direct tax upon the people, then it will follow, as a necessary consequence, that the debts of the United States might be paid in men; a doctrine too monstrous ever to be thought of in a free country.

Sir, the words "to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States," do not contain a separate and distinct delegation of power, agreeably to the idea advanced by the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. HOPKINS) yesterday on another occasion, but only relate to the application of money, arising out of taxes, duties, imposts, and excises imposed by Congress; and this is the old Republican and true doctrine. Then it must follow, if draughted militiamen, by any construction whatever, are taxes, those taxes are applicable to the payment of the public debts, the absurdity of which doctrine must be obvious to every person.

I think this part of my argument might be safely rested here, but, before I leave it, I will make one remark. If a call of the militia is a direct tax, then that part of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to lay taxes, contains in itself a power also to call out the militia; which, if correct, renders that provision in the Constitution which authorizes Congress to call out the militia for three purposes, altogether useless and nugatory. But the framers of that instrument most assuredly used the word taxes, for the purpose of raising money only; and when used in that sense, it became necessary to insert the other provision in relation to the militia.

Under these considerations I presume it must be apparent to every one that there is nothing in the Constitution which requires the apportionment to be made according to representation, and that every principle of justice and reason forbids it. Then I ask, in the name of Heaven, why are the slaveholding States, the weakest in the Union in proportion to their numbers, from the character of their population, to have this extraordinary and excessive burden thrown upon them?

Militia Draughts.

The Constitution was formed in a mutual spirit of concession and compromise; it was agreed that three-fifths of the slaves should be represented in Congress, and, as an equivalent for that privilege, it was conceded that in imposing direct taxes, they might be apportioned among the States according to representation; but it never was expected that any other burden would be laid upon them for that privilege. Had this have been anticipated, is it possible that the Constitution would have been adopted by them? I rather think not.

Sir, this excessive burden cannot be laid upon the slaveholding States for this political privilege with any more propriety than you can lay an extraordinary burden upon the small States of Delaware and Rhode Island for the political privilege of having an equal representation in the Senate, and of course an equal vote there with the largest State in the Union—although they have not, respectively, one-twelfth part of the population. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that every Representative of a slaveholding State ought to endeavor to arrest this principle in its progress, and never by their votes suffer it to be fixed upon them as an established practice, which, when once adopted, will probably never end but with the Constitution itself.

But the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) will vote for this provision of the bill as it now stands, upon the ground of liberality and generosity; that, as the Southern States had a considerable agency in the declaration of war, and bringing about the present state of things, he is willing to take hold of the laboring oar. If the gentleman, in giving his vote, would impose an extraordinary duty only upon himself and his constituents, I do not know that any others would have a right to murmur; but when that vote is not confined to his own district, but operates through the whole slaveholding country, and upon many who are not disposed to be thus generous, I think there is some cause of complaint. Nor, sir, do I approve of the ground of patriotism upon which the honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. TROUP) places his vote on this occasion. I have not the least doubt but both of those gentlemen feel the sentiments which they express, but they are high-sounding words, which we have long been used to in the southern country, and which we have always paid dearly for. If the slaveholding States bear an equal share of their country's burdens, it is all that can or ought, in justice, to be demanded of them; that far I believe they will always be willing to go, but not beyond.

I do now most earnestly beseech gentlemen who represent those States, that are equally concerned in producing the existing state of things with the slaveholding States, that they will, on the present occasion, act towards us with some degree of magnanimity and justice, and not ease themselves of a burden, by placing it upon the shoulders of others who are much less able to bear it; and I call upon the gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. STOCKTON,) who has shown himself in the discussion of this bill, to be the able advocate of civil liberty, and the rights of the people under the Constitution, that he will not suffer the spirit of that instrument to be violated by this unjust provision. With these remarks I submit to the good sense of the House whether the proposed amendment ought not to prevail.

Other gentlemen spoke for and against the motion; which was at length decided in the negative by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Archer, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bayly of Virginia, Bines, Breckenridge, Burwell, Caperton, Caldwell, Chappell, Clark, Clifton, Conard, Crawford, Culpeper, Desha, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Findley, Forney, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Hall, Hawes, Humphreys, Ingham, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Lewis, Macon, McCoy, McKim, Montgomery, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Pearson, Pickens, Pleasants, Roane, Robertson, Sevier, Sharp, Sheffey, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Stuart, Tannehill, Telfair, White, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey—66.

The bill having been further amended—

A motion was made by Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, to amend the bill by striking out these words, as applied to the term of service of the draughted militia: "for the term of one year from the time of meeting at the place of rendezvous, unless sooner discharged," and to insert these words, "to serve for the term prescribed by existing laws;" that is, to serve for six months instead of one year.

On this motion a question of order arose, when the SPEAKER decided it to be in order; and his decision being appealed from, was confirmed by yeas and nays—129 to 20.

After some debate on this point, the question on Mr. WEBSTER'S motion was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Avery, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Burwell, Butler, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Comstock, Cooper,

So the motion was negatived by a majority of one vote.

A motion was then made by Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, to recommit the bill to a Committee of the Whole; which motion was negatived.

A motion was then made by Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, further to amend the first section of the bill by striking out the words, "to serve for the term of one year from the time of meeting at the place of rendezvous, unless sooner discharged," and to insert these words: "to serve a term not exceeding seven months after arriving at the place of rendezvous." And, before deciding on the motion, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 13.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the regulation of the courts of justice of Indiana; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting, in obedience to a resolution of the 7th instant, a statement of forfeitures which have accrued to the United States on account of the purchase of public lands; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "authorizing the appointment of certain naval officers therein named," in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on various goods, wares, and merchandise; which bill having been read over, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The following motion was submitted for consideration by Mr. WRIGHT:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting the receipt of the paper of any bank in the United States for any debts due on demand of the United States, which said bank shall refuse to receive the Treasury notes of the United States, already issued or hereafter to be issued; and, also, into the expediency of issuing Treasury notes of small denominations.

The said motion lies on the table.

PETITION OF JAMES LINDSEY.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of James Lindsey; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House. The report is as follows:

That in the year 1802, Joseph Scott, the Marshal of Virginia, sold, for the direct tax due thereon, a tract of land estimated at about eight thousand acres, supposed to be the property of Levi Judson, and lying in the county of Harrison and State of Virginia. William Scott, of Trenton, in New Jersey, became the purchaser at the sale of the marshal, and has since sold the land in question to the petitioner. It is stated by the petitioner, that, since the purchase of the land from William Scott, he has discovered that the land did not belong to Judson, and was therefore improperly sold as his property. He complains of having sustained damages in consequence of the contract, and asks of Congress such relief as may be just and equitable.

Your committee are of opinion he is not entitled to relief from the United States:

1st. Because it does not appear the land did not belong to Judson; no judicial decision having been made thereon.

2dly. Because William Scott, who was the purchaser at the marshal's sale, sold to the petitioner, and who must be liable to him, if any person is.

3dly. Because, under these circumstances, the United States cannot be considered the warrantor of the property sold.

The committee, therefore, recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

MILITIA DRAUGHTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate, authorizing the President to call into service eighty thousand four hundred and thirty militia, for the defence of the frontiers.

The motion of Mr. WRIGHT, to make the term of service seven months after arriving at the place of rendezvous, instead of one year as the bill now stands, being before the House—

Mr. WRIGHT supported this proposition by a few remarks, in the course of which, he decidedly expressed the opinion that no measure, except providing money, was necessary for filling the ranks of the Army.

DECEMBER, 1814.

Militia Draughts.

H. OF R.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, spoke as follows :

Mr. Speaker, presuming from the vote which was taken yesterday, upon a question similar to the one now under consideration, that I shall vote differently from the most of my colleagues on the proposed amendment, I beg the indulgence of the House while I submit the reasons which will influence my vote.

I shall vote for it, sir, because a whole year is too long to keep militia in the field, and because, if the bill passes in its present shape, I find many gentlemen are prepared to adopt it as a substitute for the more efficient measure recommended by the Secretary of War. But, while I am opposed to the bill in its present form, I wish it to be understood that I am not influenced by the reasons urged by gentlemen in the opposition. I do not believe with them that it is unconstitutional to draught militia for twelve months, nor am I induced to vote as I shall from their declamations against conscription.

Before I proceed to examine into the objects and merits of the bill now before the House, I will take the liberty of noticing some of the arguments of an honorable gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. STROCKTON) upon the constitutionality of its provisions. He says that the Government of the United States is composed of special and limited powers; that it is a Government of checks and balances, there being powers delegated and powers reserved; that such as have not been expressly delegated are reserved by the tenth amendment to the Constitution, which is founded on a principle of reason applicable in the construction of public as well as private powers; and, that as the Constitution only gives Congress the right to call forth the militia "to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," the provisions of the bill are unconstitutional. He says that the power is granted to call out the militia to repel invasion when it happens, but that we abuse the power by calling them out to be ready to repel invasion when it happens.

I agree with the honorable gentleman that the General Government is composed of powers delegated by the people, which, in their nature, are special and limited; that is to say, they are limited as to the subjects upon which Congress shall legislate, and, in many cases, as to the extent to which Congress shall go in legislating on particular subjects. But there are some subjects upon which Congress have been vested with unlimited power to legislate.

It is true, also, that all powers which have not been expressly delegated, and which are not necessary and proper to be exercised in order to carry the powers expressly delegated into execution, are reserved; and this reservation of power is not founded alone upon the declaration in the tenth article of the amendments to the Constitution, but is founded upon a principle of reason and common sense. All sovereign power was originally vested in the people, and so much as they have not delegated, they must, of course, have retained. It is a principle universally applicable in the construction of all powers, whether of a public, municipal, or private character. But let us see whether the application of this principle will support the honorable gentleman in the position which he has taken. He admits that Congress may provide for calling out the militia to repel invasion, but contends that we have not the power to provide for calling them out before the happening of the invasion, in order to place them in a state of readiness to enable them to repel it when it does happen. The construction which the gentleman would give that provision of the Constitution, would render the power delegated perfectly nugatory; because, if the Government was compelled to wait until after the country was actually invaded, before the militia could be called out, the enemy could always burn and plunder our cities and villages, and retire without our limits, before opposition could be made to his incursions. Such a construction would be unreasonable, and would be calculated to take from the country its legitimate means of defence, and to place our seaboard at the mercy of the enemy. The power being expressly granted to Congress to provide for calling forth the militia to repel invasion, we have also the power necessary and proper to be exercised in order to enable the Government to make ready before hand, when its danger is threatened, to meet and repel it when it happens. But if the doctrine of the gentleman was correct, still the provisions of the bill would not be unconstitutional, because the country is already actually invaded, there being scarcely a day but that some inroads are made by the enemy upon our maritime or inland frontier.

The gentleman, however, in the course of his remarks, stated that the act of 1795, which provides for calling forth the militia, had put this question upon its true grounds—that is to say, "that whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia," &c. Now, to my mind, the arguments of the gentleman are entirely contradictory. At one time, he says that we abuse the power vested in Congress by providing for calling out the militia, to be ready to repel invasion when it happens; and, at another time, he admits that Congress possess the power to provide for calling out the militia in case of imminent danger of invasion.

What, sir, can the act of 1795 mean, unless it was intended that whenever invasion became seriously threatened, the militia should be called forth to be ready to repel it? It surely could not mean that the militia should not be called forth unless in case of actual invasion. But gentlemen say that it is conscription, and that it is equally unconstitutional with the measure for raising a regular army recommended by the Secretary of War. Sir, I have no doubt of the power of Congress to pass the law under consideration, nor have I any doubt as to our power to pass a law embracing the plan recommended for raising a regular army.

In order for us to ascertain whether Congress possess the power to raise regular armies otherwise than by voluntary enlistment, I consider it necessary that we should go back and see what practice was pursued for the purpose of raising armies in the time of the Revolutionary war, previous to the adoption of the Constitution. We should then examine the language of that part of the Constitution which we contend contains the delegation of unlimited power to raise armies, and afterwards notice the construction which was given to it early after its adoption, by persons eminently calculated to decide correctly upon it.

Previous to the adoption of the Constitution, while we were engaged in the Revolution, we find that we were compelled to resort, for the purpose of raising armies, to other more efficient measures than voluntary enlistment. The extracts which have been furnished us by Mr. Monroe, in his report to the chairman of your Military Committee, show the practice upon this subject at that day. We learn from them that when voluntary enlistments fell short of the proposed number, the deficiencies were, by the laws of several States, to be made up by draughts or lots from the militia. The towns in New England, and the counties in the Middle States, were respectively called on for a specified number of men. Such was the zeal of the people in New England, that neighbors would often club together to engage one of their number to go into the army. Maryland directed her lieutenants of counties to class all the property in their respective counties into as many equal classes as there were men wanted, and each class was by law obliged, within ten days thereafter, to furnish an able-bodied recruit during the war; and in case of their neglecting or refusing to do so, the county lieutenants were authorized to procure men at their expense, at any rate not exceeding fifteen pounds in every hundred pounds' worth of property classed agreeably to law. Virginia and Pennsylvania pursued plans equally as efficient.

This, then, having been the practice previous to the adoption of the Constitution, and the framers of that instrument having been intimately acquainted with it, if they had intended, while they were delegating to Congress the power to raise and support armies, that armies should not be raised otherwise than by voluntary enlistment, it is fair to presume that the power would have been given in terms limited to that extent.

But what is the language of the Constitution in relation to this subject? It is, that "Congress shall have power to raise and support armies; but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years." As to the mode of raising regular armies, whether by voluntary enlistment, by draught, or by classification, there is no restriction in the power granted. The mode is reserved to be prescribed by the discretion of Congress. It is true that the abuse of the power thus vested is provided against, by prohibiting appropriations from being made for the support of regular armies for a longer term than two years. This was done for the purpose of enabling the people at a subsequent election to put an end to the employment of armies unnecessarily raised, by electing persons to vote against additional supplies. But nothing can fairly be collected from any provision in the Constitution which will infer an intention on the part of the framers of it to prohibit regular armies from being raised otherwise than by voluntary enlistment. And can it be believed, sir, that the members of the Convention, who were so well acquainted with the practice pursued by the whole country in raising armies, would have given Congress a power embraced in terms so unlimited and unqualified, if they had intended to exclude every other mode of raising armies but by voluntary enlistment? Surely not. As regards the control of the militia, the power of Congress has been limited—they cannot be called forth but for three purposes. And this has been urged as an evidence that it was not intended to vest Congress with the power of raising armies in the way contended for. But to my mind the limited power in the one case affords no evidence of an intention to limit it in the other, where the power is granted without limitation. Under the power granted over the militia, it was intended that they might be called forth en masse if necessary, for any of the purposes mentioned. And as unlimited power was given to raise a regular force, competent for every purpose of the Government, it was no doubt deemed necessary to limit the occasions which justify the calling forth the militia.

But in order to settle all doubt as to the proper construction to be given to that provision of the Constitution, which authorizes Congress to raise armies, we need only to refer to the opinion of General WASHINGTON, given upon that subject at the second session of the first Congress, in the year 1790. And I would suppose, that a construction given to the instrument soon after its adoption by a person who should be presumed to have understood the intention of the framers of it (he being one of them) ought to have some influence, even with legal gentlemen.

We find, from a report made by General Knox, then Secretary of War, the principles of which were modified and sanctioned by General WASHINGTON, that a system for raising a regular army, in case the exigencies of the country should require it, by classification, similar to the plan now recommended to us by Mr. Monroe, was concluded upon and submitted to Congress.

But an honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) has said, that the opinion of General WASHINGTON is not good authority upon a subject of this nature—that he was raised a soldier in the camp, and therefore it ought not to be presumed that he was capable of giving as correct a construction to the Constitution as the civilians of the present day are. Sir, I flatter myself that the honorable gentleman will never bring the people of this nation to think so lightly of the talents and judgment of that distinguished character, as to believe him to have been incapable of putting a proper construction upon the Constitution of his country, in the adoption of which he had acted so conspicuous a part.

Militia Draughts.

H. OF R.

Besides, at that day Gen. Hamilton was Secretary of the Treasury; and, as the Presidents have always been in the habit of consulting the members of their Cabinet upon all important subjects, it is but reasonable to conclude that the plan reported by the Secretary of War, modified and sanctioned by General WASHINGTON, was not without his approbation. It therefore, sir, appears to be manifest to my mind, that it is not only Constitutional for Congress to pass the bill now under consideration, but that we do possess the power to raise a regular army in the manner recommended by the Secretary of War. The mode of raising regular armies previous to the adoption of the Constitution, the unqualified grant of power upon the subject, and the construction given to it by such high authority, soon after it went into operation—all conspire to produce the confirmation of my opinion in the positions which I have taken.

But, sir, I am opposed to the extension of the time of service of the militia to twelve months, not because I think it unconstitutional, but because I think it entirely inexpedient, and well calculated to produce much mischief, if not ruin to the country. If this bill passes in its present shape, I understand from its friends that it is to be received and adopted as a substitute for the plan for raising a regular army recommended to us by the Secretary of War, the provisions of which are contained in the bill reported by the Military Committee of this House. And in that event, I presume it is contemplated to rest the fate of the next campaign on a militia force, and the few regulars that this bill and our other laws are calculated to produce.

I have witnessed, sir, with the deepest concern and regret, a disposition on the part of gentlemen in this House, to pursue a measure so feeble and inefficient, at a time when all the energies of the nation should be called forth to meet the danger with which the country is threatened.

With a view, sir, to show the inexpediency of relying upon the force to be raised by the provisions of this bill, I will examine: First—whether a course of policy will put the most speedy termination to the war, which provides that in the future prosecution of it, our arms shall be confined within our territorial limits? and, secondly, if it will not, whether the bill now under consideration is the best calculated to raise an efficient force to operate in the enemy's provinces?

As to the first point—it does appear to me, sir, that a little reflection ought to convince us of the danger and inexpediency of relying so entirely on defensive operations to put an end to this war. We find from experience, that, our maritime frontier being nearly two thousand miles in extent, the enemy has it in his power, with his means of transportation, to keep upwards of one hundred thousand of our militia continually in the field, with not more than eight or ten thousand British troops. If we fail to keep any vulnerable point properly defended by an immense militia force, it is immediately exposed to the mercy of the enemy, and the conflagration and plunder of our towns, and the ruin of our citizens, follow as consequences.

The British transport vessels are continually hovering upon our coast from Maine to New Orleans, with a view, as well to keep our militia in the field, that the expenses of the war may be increased, as to lay waste those places which they find undefended. We are thus going on with a defensive war, prosecuted almost alone by a militia force, which by far is the most expensive to the Government and oppressive to the people, while it is the least efficient that could be employed.

And can it be expected, sir, that England is entirely ignorant of the fact, that this course of policy is ruinous to this nation? No, sir—an examination of the measures adopted by that Government ought to convince us, that she is endeavoring to influence our deliberations, and to paralyze our preparations for the offensive prosecution of this war. They know well, from experience, that they can practise with success upon our credulity. It is their object and their interest to prevent us from providing a regular force at the present session. They know that such a force could be provided and employed in the next campaign with success on our part. And they also know, that if we can be prevented from adopting such an efficient plan, and can be induced to rely still longer upon a militia force and upon defensive measures, that it will be the means of increasing our public burden and of breaking down the spirit of the people, while it will facilitate, and give time to ripen into perfection, their schemes for our subjugation and ruin.

What course of policy does it appear that the British Government has been pursuing? We find that early in the month of August last, at a time when they expected that Congress would not be convened until December, the conditions offered our Ministers for the restoration of peace were disgraceful and humiliating. They claimed the surrender on our part of nearly one-third of the territorial limits of the United States. But as soon as they found that Congress was convened, they deemed it necessary to recede from their haughty demands, and to manifest an almost entire willingness to conclude a treaty upon terms acceptable to our Government. Still, however, they kept minor obstacles in the way of a final settlement of our differences, and procrastination was discovered by our Ministers to be their object. With a view further to prevent strong grounds from being taken by Congress, in the establishment of an efficient regular force, calculated at once to put a termination to the war, Lord Hill's expedition, with which we have been threatened, was at once suspended, and it was made known through the medium of the ministerial prints that the prospects of a rupture upon the continent of Europe rendered the suspension necessary. It should be expected that such measures will be pursued by the British Government in conducting the negotiation at Ghent, and in the management of their affairs at the Congress of Vienna, as will be best calculated to deceive us, and to relax the vigor of our measures at the present session. They well knew that the arrival of Lord Hill with his forces upon our coast, would have driven Congress into the adoption of more efficient and vigorous measures for the prosecution of the war. They therefore deemed it necessary to suspend his expedition, and to lower their tone towards our Ministers, with the hope that, in the anticipation of peace, the measures of Congress would be relaxed accordingly.

H. OF R.

Militia Draughts.

DECEMBER, 1814.

Sir, it is evident that the British Government never will make peace with us so long as they find that we continue to rely so exclusively upon defensive measures in the prosecution of the war. They see, most clearly, that it must ultimately terminate in their favor, unless the character of it is changed on our part. The support of the immense militia force which we have continually to keep up, is entailing upon this nation a public burden which, in a few years longer, will become truly oppressive upon the people; and so long as we continue this course of policy, there are no visible prospects of putting a termination to the war. The enemy knows our situation, and it would afford evidence of his weakness to make peace with us so long as we continue to pursue a policy so admirably calculated to make us conquer ourselves.

But, sir, there is a mode by which this war can be speedily terminated in a manner honorable to this nation. An overwhelming force should be thrown into Canada at the opening of the next campaign, calculated to extort from the enemy an acknowledgment of our rights, and reparation for our wrongs. If one hundred thousand men could be marched across the lines early in the next Summer, it would immediately give relief to the whole of our seaboard. The enemy would be compelled to concentrate his forces there to save his provinces, and we could there meet him, and beat him, and put an end to the war. I would conquer the enemy's provinces, not with the view of extending the territorial limits of the United States, for I am aware of the pernicious example of cherishing a thirst for foreign conquest, but I would conquer them to be again surrendered to him, upon being indemnified for the injuries which he has done us. I would rather they should remain British provinces, for they will always afford a safe and convenient pledge for the security of our commercial rights.

It must, I think, be agreed, that it is in the power of Congress to raise such an army, and it is acknowledged on all sides that it would put an end to the war. The question, then, ought to be, is the bill now under consideration the best calculated to produce such a force? I think not, sir. On the contrary, it does appear to me, that if the British Government had it in their power to control the deliberations of this body, they could not devise the adoption of a measure, of a military character, better calculated to subserve their purposes. If the bill passes in its present shape, it is very obvious that it will not produce the regular force contemplated by its friends, nor will the provisions of the bill secure to the members of each class any probable chance of raising the two militiamen, or the one regular, by contribution.

The militia, therefore, who have not served a tour of duty, will have to be draughted for twelve months instead of six; and the consequence will be, that we shall rest the fate of the next campaign, as we did the last, almost alone upon a militia force, the operations of which will be confined mostly, as it heretofore has been, within the limits of the United States. It is true that the bill contains a provision authorizing each class to raise, either by contract or by draught, the two militiamen to serve for twelve months; and it also exempts them from the draught, provided they will furnish one able-bodied recruit to serve for five years, if the war should so long continue. And upon the first view of the bill as it came from the Senate, and as it was reported by the select committee of this House, to whom it was afterwards referred to be amended, its provisions appeared to be fair, with the exception that no mode was pointed out by which to enable the members of each class to employ the men by contract, in case there should be a disinclination on the part of any to contribute according to property. It was believed, at first, that this defect could be remedied by an amendment, which was afterwards, however, introduced by an honorable gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. McLEAN,) and rejected. The amendment provided that a majority of each class should decide whether the men required of them to be furnished should be raised by contract or by draught; that where it was concluded to furnish them by contract, every person within the class, whether subject to militia duty or not, was to be compelled to contribute according to property; and provision was made for the ascertainment and collection of the sum to be paid by each to the draughts or the regular hired by the class. The principles contained in this amendment were considered to be fair, equitable, and just, because they were bottomed upon the rule that the wealth of the nation should furnish the army to defend it. But it was astonishing to me, when I discovered that the warmest friends of the bill were the first and most zealous in opposition to the amendment. They are willing that the bill should contain a provision allowing each class to furnish their men by contract; but they are opposed to the principle which would compel the members of the classes to contribute according to property. It follows, therefore, that they will not agree to compel the most wealthy man in a class to contribute more than the poorest. And what will be the operation of the bill throughout the nation? Sir, the wealthy will almost invariably refuse to join in a contribution according to property for the purpose of raising men by contract, because they would have much more to pay than the poorer members of the class. A few (perhaps not more than one, in many cases) of the most wealthy of a class will drive the balance into a draught, by which means they will stand the same chance to get clear as the poorest members of it. If it should fall upon the wealthy, their circumstances will enable them to hire substitutes; but if it falls upon the poor man, he has no alternative but to serve his tour of duty.

Militia Draughts.

H. OF R.

In opposition to that amendment, it has been contended by an honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SHEFFEY,) and the same argument has since been used by an honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES,) that there are two kinds of service due from the people to their Government; that is to say, personal or military service, and service by pecuniary contribution; that the wealthy contribute to the support of Government by the way of taxes; and that when military services are wanting, they should be afforded by the militia without regard to property. And, in order to illustrate this doctrine, the gentleman from South Carolina told us the other day that he would state a case which would occur if the amendment was adopted, that he was sure would have prevented the introduction of the amendment by the gentleman from Ohio, if he had known of it. The case was, that an honorable colleague of his represented a district upon this floor, which, if the amendment was adopted, would have to pay, according to the plan of contribution proposed, a tax equal to its proportion of a tax upon the United States of eighty-five millions of dollars. Now, sir, the case put by the honorable gentleman was so far from convincing me of the impropriety and unjust operation of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, that it manifested the necessity of its adoption still more clearly to me. The gentleman from South Carolina was willing to impose upon his colleague's district, by the passage of the bill in its present shape, the performance of military service to the value of a sum equal to its proportion of a tax upon the United States of an immense amount; and yet he was unwilling to afford to a majority of each class of the militia of that district the liberty of deciding whether the classes should furnish persons to perform the military service required of them by contract rather than by draught. He seems to suppose that, if the men were raised by a pecuniary contribution according to property, the service required of that district to the Government would be too great; whereas, if the same service was rendered by men to be draughted from each class, it would not be too great. I am aware, sir, that the principles of that amendment would not suit the owners of the large cotton plantations, and overgrown fortunes in the South, because, as members of their classes, they would have to contribute according to their wealth; but the provisions would be just in their operations upon the great body of the people of the nation. Sir, I cannot agree with gentlemen, that when military services are called for, that they shall be rendered by the militia without regard to property. This rule may be endured while the militia tours are short, but it ought not to be suffered, should it be so increased.

Sir, it is true, that the wealthy contribute to the support of Government in the payment of taxes, but it is equally true, that the poorer classes of the community have always been made to pay taxes also, in proportion to the value of their property. The direct taxes and internal duties imposed at the present session, will bear heavier upon the common people of the country than upon the wealthier portion of the community. The direct tax of six millions is paid as equally by all, according to property, as the Constitution will permit, but the internal duties are not; for the seven or eight million whiskey tax, which is the largest item in our system of taxation, will be paid mostly by that class of the community who render the most military service. We lay, then, a tax of six millions of dollars in money upon the people of the nation, to be collected according to property; and, allowing the military services of a militiaman to be worth two hundred dollars for twelve months, it is proposed by this bill to lay a tax of sixteen millions of dollars upon the militia of the nation, to be collected in personal services, without regard to property. It is unreasonable and unjust for the wealth of the nation to bear so small a proportion of the public burden.

It really does appear to me, sir, that since the amendment which was proposed by the gentleman from Ohio has been rejected, the bill is calculated to do much more mischief than good. The classes will not agree to raise regulars instead of the draughts, unless it could be done by a contribution according to property, and this contribution but seldom ever would be agreed to voluntarily by all the members of the classes. Perhaps there would be a few exceptions in some of the most patriotic quarters of the Union. But can it be believed that Massachusetts, and the rest of the New England States, would furnish any regulars? I think not, sir. They would stand the draught, and, as militia, they would claim to be kept within the limits of the United States. I shall not pretend to say whether this claim would be justified by the provisions of the Constitution or not, but it appears that the Senate entertained an opinion favorable to that pretension, by their having incorporated a provision in this bill, confining the operations of the militia within the United States. The militia draughts in the New England States would all have, by the provisions of the bill, to be called out; they would not march beyond the line, where alone they would be wanting, but they would remain in camp, within their own States, squandering the public revenue, while they would be entirely useless to the Government. And what would the militia of Tennessee have to do? Those who have not yet served a tour of duty, and who would not be enabled to hire substitutes, would be compelled to leave their families, and their farms, and march to Mobile and New Orleans, where they would have to remain in camp for a whole year, in the most sickly climate on the continent. This burden will be unequal and unjust in its operation, because many of the most wealthy persons in the community will be excluded from bearing any portion of it. And it will be borne with less fortitude by those whose duty it may become to perform this twelve months tour, when they recollect that this species of force, relied on again by Congress, is better fit for the purpose of increasing the public debt, and for producing greater distress in the country, than for putting a termination to the war.

H. OF R.

The character of the militia of Tennessee, sir, is well known throughout the nation. They are known to be a brave, patriotic, and magnanimous people—always ready to bear, with the most distinguished cheerfulness, any burden imposed upon them by the Government, whether of a pecuniary or a military kind, which they may think in the least calculated to promote the common cause of their country. There are many thousands of them now marching through a wilderness of several hundred miles in extent to meet and repel the invasion of the enemy. And on this occasion, sir, I will beg leave to read a short extract from a paper published at Nashville, showing the alacrity with which the militia turned out upon a late emergency, when there was a call upon that State for five thousand men to march to the defence of the Louisiana country. It is in these words:

"TUESDAY, November 16, 1814.

"We must confess that we are not capable of describing the pleasure we have experienced for the last week, in viewing the alacrity with which our brother Tennesseans have turned out in defence of their injured country; but for an evidence of their patriotism, the following may serve as a proof. In the past week there has been almost as many offering their services as substitutes, as there were men called for by the Government. And, one man offering his services to a youth, he was answered, that he (the youth) would not take twenty-five dollars for his place. We could add a number of like instances."

I have read this, sir, to show that the people of Tennessee are prepared to make any sacrifices to aid the Government in resisting the encroachments of the enemy, and in prosecuting this war, in a way calculated to put and to it, in a manner honorable to the country. But, sir, let me tell you, that while these people are thus prepared to make every sacrifice, and to meet every danger, they have a right to expect that Congress, at a time like the present, will at least do its part. They have expected that Congress, upon receiving the first despatches from our Ministers, would immediately determine to raise an efficient regular force, capable of putting an end to this war. But, sir, instead of doing this, we are about to adopt a measure of all others the very best calculated to prolong its duration. For the bill in its operation would not produce regulars, but would require a most oppressive kind of militia service. This kind of service answers alone for defensive operations, and I repeat again that it cannot put an end to this war. Believing, then, as I do, that the bill would fail to answer the expectations of its friends, in producing a regular force, I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. WRIGHT,) with the hope that its adoption will the means of rejecting the bill before us, and that we shall afterwards take up and adopt the more efficient measure contained in the bill reported by our Military Committee. The President is already authorized to order out any number of militia for six months, and I am unwilling to extend the time of that kind of service to twelve months. But if this measure is persisted in, and the bill should pass as it now is, I think I plainly see the consequences that are to result from it. An overgrown public debt will be heaped upon us; the spirit of the people will be broken down by oppressive and ruinous twelve months tours of militia service, and the increased taxes which it will be necessary for them to pay. And in three or four years from now, after the nation is nearly ruined, we shall be driven to the necessity, before we can get rid of this war, of adopting the measure recommended by the Secretary of War and reported by our Military Committee.

But I have heard it suggested by gentlemen, friendly to draughting the militia for two years, with permission to each class to furnish a regular, that it would be unconstitutional to raise a regular force in the manner provided by the other military bill which lies upon the table. They are willing to pass the bill before us as it came from the Senate, for draughting the militia for two years, without the incorporation of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, and yet they consider unconstitutional the provisions of the other bill which provides that every class of twenty-five militia shall furnish a recruit for during the war, by a contribution, from all within the class, according to property, whether subject to militia duty or not, under a penalty to be inflicted and collected from the class. Now, to my mind, sir, if the one is unconstitutional, the other must be so too. In the one case, each class of the militia must furnish a regular, without the principle of compelling every member of the class to contribute according to property, (without which it could not be done,) under the penalty of a draught of a two years' tour of service. In the other case, every class would be compelled to furnish a regular by contribution according to property (which would enable them to do it) or pay a penalty to be collected from the class. If you have a right to say that a class shall furnish a regular, without prescribing any rule by which it shall be done, or be subject to a two years' tour of duty, you would upon the same principle have the right to compel a class to furnish a regular, or be subject to a draught for a ten years' tour of duty. I have heard it said, sir, that the adoption of the measure recommended to us by the Secretary of War would afford a precedent, the abuse of which might be dangerous in future times. I am in favor of saving the country with the Constitutional means which appear to my mind to present themselves. Whenever the Congress of the United States shall become so corrupt as to determine upon the ruin of this Government, by the abuse of the power delegated to them, they will not be prevented from doing so alone by the want of precedents. If they should determine in future to raise regular armies when the necessities of the country should not need them, the plan, if adopted, which is now under consideration, would as well afford them a precedent by which they could do so, as the plan proposed by the Secretary of War. They could lay the militia of the nation off into classes, and compel every class to furnish a regular, under the penalty of being subject to a draught for a ten years' tour of duty.

Militia Draughts.

H. OF R.

I hope, sir, that the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland will be adopted, and that the bill will afterwards be rejected. We can then take up the other bill containing the more efficient measure, and provide a force for the next campaign competent for the protection of the nation. A force raised in that way will be less oppressive upon the people, and will better answer the purposes of the Government in putting a speedy termination to the war. By adopting that plan, we can be able to march a force into Canada at the opening of the next campaign, which would wring from the enemy an advantageous peace.

But, sir, if we do not adopt that measure, the country may be ruined by our neglect. The enemy is evidently making every preparation to strike a deadly blow at us in the commencement of the next campaign—and it is our duty to provide against it. Suppose we should neglect to provide an efficient regular force, and the enemy should invade the country in the early part of the next campaign with forty or fifty thousand regular troops, what would be the situation of the nation? Sir, I hope this feeble and inefficient measure will not be adopted. If it is not, we can take up the other bill, and we shall then see who are willing, at a time like the present, to take upon themselves the responsibility of voting against the only measure capable of affording protection to the country, and of putting the most speedy termination to the war.

After some explanatory remarks from Mr. LOWNDES in reply to Mr. HARRIS, and in rejoinder by him—

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, made a short speech in reply to Mr. HARRIS. He considered this as a bill for relieving the militia from frequent and harassing calls on them for occasional service.

The previous question was now required by Mr. YANCEY of North Carolina, but was not sanctioned by a sufficient number. The House was equally divided, 66 to 66, and the SPEAKER, voting in the negative, quashed the motion.

Mr. CANNON spoke briefly against the reduction of the term of service, as proposed, and expressed some doubts of the expediency of the bill, as well as of the necessity of any measure of this character to fill the ranks of the Army.

Mr. KILBOURN, of Ohio, opposed the motion to reduce the term of service, intending, if that motion was rejected, to move to increase the term of service to one year and eight months.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, on Mr. WRIGHT's motion, and decided in the negative—for the motion 71, against it 84, as follows:

YEA'S—Messrs. Alexander, Avery, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Burwell, Butler, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Ely, Gaston, Geddes, Gholson, Grosvenor, Hale, Harris, Henderson, Howell, Kennedy, Kent of New York, Kerr, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Macon, Markell, Miller, Moseley, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Ruggles, Schureman, Sheffey, Shipherd, Slaymaker, Smith of New York, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Stockton, Stuart, Sturges, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Williams, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, and Wright.

So the House refused to reduce the term of service below one year.

Mr. BAYLIES, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the bill by adding thereto the following as a new section:

"And be it further enacted, That the militia called forth by virtue of this act shall not be liable to perform any service, except such as may be necessary to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or execute the laws of the Union."

This motion was negatived, by yeas and nays—103 to 58, as follows:

land, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Leferts, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Williams, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey—103.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, renewed the motion he had unsuccessfully made in Committee of the Whole, to add to the bill the following section, by way of amendment:

And be it further enacted, That if any class shall neglect for five days after having been notified to furnish a recruit to the regular army, or two substitutes, agreeably to the provisions of this act, a majority of the individuals composing such class shall have power to bind the whole of the class for the payment of any sum that may be necessary to procure a recruit to the regular army, or two substitutes, as aforesaid; provided such sum shall not exceed three hundred dollars; and all persons residing within the district of such class, who are exempt from militia duty, shall be liable for the payment of such sum as shall be engaged to the recruit or substitutes aforesaid, equally with those who are liable to perform militia duty.

And be it further enacted, That when a recruit or substitutes shall be obtained, as aforesaid, the sum agreed to be given shall be certified by the class, or a majority of them, to the captain of the company in which they or a majority of them belong, who shall immediately ascertain how much each individual within the district must pay, apportioning the amount according to the real and personal property possessed; the amount of property to be ascertained by the valuation made under the laws of the United States, and of the individual State; but, where no such valuation shall have been made, the captain shall cause a valuation to be made by three disinterested and respectable freeholders under oath, who shall be paid by the class one dollar and fifty cents each per day for their services, to be assessed and collected with the appointment aforesaid.

And be it further enacted, That when the apportionment shall have been made as aforesaid by the captain, he shall advertise the same in the most public place within each class, particularly specifying the amount each individual is required to pay, and each individual, within the class aforesaid, shall pay or satisfy the same to the recruit or substitutes within ten days thereafter; and, in default thereof, the captain shall notify the commandant of the regiment in which he belongs, who shall order a court martial immediately to assemble, which court shall take into consideration the apportionment made as aforesaid, and on finding the same to have been made agreeably to the provisions of this act, shall proceed to assess the same as a fine on the delinquents, which shall be collected with costs as other fines are, and when collected shall be paid to the recruit or substitutes, or to his or their order.

And be it further enacted, That the court martial, called as aforesaid, shall have power to correct any errors or relieve against any inequality that may have taken place, either in the valuation of property or in the apportionment, by equalizing the amount amongst the citizens within the class.

This motion was pronounced by the SPEAKER to be out of order, in the present stage of the bill.

Mr. KILBOURN, of Ohio, then moved to amend the bill by adding eighteen months to the present proposed term of service, so as to make it one year and eight months.

Mr. KING, of North Carolina, from a desire to preclude these motions, and to come to a decision on the bill at once, requested the previous question; but was not supported therein by a sufficient number, fifty-six members, who rose in support of it, not constituting a majority of the House.

The question on Mr. KILBOURN's motion was then taken, and decided in the negative. For the motion 63, against it 95, as follows:

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, with the express view of incorporating in the bill provisions which he deemed necessary to give it efficacy, moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, opposed this motion with much zeal, and contended for the efficacy of the bill as it then stood, either to afford a valuable militia force, or a body of recruits for the regular Army, which were much wanted. The bill was not as efficient as he wished, but, his opinion having been overruled as to the details of the bill, was no reason for him to reject the bill altogether. It was high time, he added, that Congress should rouse themselves from their lethargy, and at length proceed to act.

Mr. INGERSOLL then, with a view to enable the House to proceed without further delay to the consideration of other highly important bills on the table of the House, again required the previous question.

Many members supporting the demand, the previous question was propounded, in the usual form, "Shall the main question be now put?" and decided in the affirmative. For the question 101, against it 57, as follows:

The main question, viz: on the engrossing of the amendments and ordering the bill to be read a third time, was decided in the affirmative—yeas 91, nays 71, as follows:

And the said bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, December 14.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a petition of Jonathan Bradley Eastman, late paymaster to the troops in the district of the Lakes, stating that, by the surrender of Detroit, by the late General Hull, a large sum of public money, together with his accounts and vouchers, fell into the hands of the enemy, by which he is unable to settle with the War Department, and praying relief from Congress.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. TAYLOR presented a petition of the President and Directors of the New York State Bank, and of the Mechanics and Farmers' Bank of Albany, recommending an issue of "national bills of credit," to a limited amount, having the quality of a legal tender in payment of all contracts.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FISK, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the bill from the Senate, "to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America," with amendments; which were read, and, together with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and by amending the act laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors," and ask a conference upon the same; to which conference they have appointed managers on their part.

Mr. FARROW, from the committee appointed on the 25th ultimo, on the petition of John Motlow, made a report; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.—The report is as follows:

It is represented that, in the month of October, 1781, the petitioner, with a number of others, were in a fort called Jamersons, in the State of South Carolina, that a party of Indians and Tories took the fort by force, put to death a great number of those so garrisoned, and made prisoners of the balance, (among the slain were the father of the petitioner;) and carried off three negroes, the property of the petitioner and his intestate father, whose legal representative the petitioner is. It is further represented that repeated endeavors have been made by the petitioner, at very great expense, to recover the said negroes, but without success.

And it further appears, that the ninth article of the treaty of 1798, concluded with the Cherokees, by obliterating all prior aggressions, plunderings, and thefts, to that date, has finally changed the right of property, and made a legal and complete transfer of the same from the petitioner over to the said nation.

The following is a copy of the said article: "It is mutually agreed between the parties, that horses stolen, and not returned within ninety days, shall be paid for at the rate of sixty dollars each; if stolen by a white man, citizen of the United States, the Indian proprietor shall be paid in cash; and if stolen by an Indian from a citizen, to be deducted, as expressed in the fourth article of the treaty of Philadelphia. This article shall have retrospect to the commencement of the first conferences at this place in the present year, and no further; and all animosities, aggressions, thefts, and plunderings prior to this day, shall cease, and be no longer remembered or demanded on either side."

And it further appears, by the fourth article of the said treaty, that the United States received a large cession of territory from the said nation for considerations therein expressed.

From an attentive consideration of the facts of this case and the principles that govern the same, the committee are of opinion that the prayer of the petition is equitable and just, and submit the following resolution to the House:

Resolved, That the request of the petitioner ought to be granted.

On motion of Mr. McCox, of Virginia, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the direct tax assessment law, so as that the county of Bath, now a part of the sixth collection district, may be added to, and made part of, the seventh collection district in the State of Virginia.

The bill from the Senate for the appointment of certain naval officers, was read twice and committed.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of John C. Hurlburt, of Chatham, in Connecticut, was read a third time; and, on motion of Mr. Fisk, of Vermont, supported by Mr. BRADLEY the bill was postponed to Monday week, to allow time to obtain further evidence on this case.

The engrossed bill for the regulation of the courts of Indiana, was read a third time. [The bill provides that the Legislature of Indiana may fix the place of sittings of the General Court, and that two judges shall be present to form a court.]

Considerable conversation took place on a proposition by Mr. EPPES to postpone the bill, in the course of which Mr. EPPES, Mr. LEWIS, and Mr. ROBERTSON, expressed their doubts as to its expediency, and a desire to examine it further; and Mr. INGERSOLL and Mr. JENNINGS explained its provisions, &c. At length, on motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

COMPENSATION OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Roads be instructed to inquire whether any, and if any, what, change ought to be made in the compensation allowed to Postmasters; and whether any, and if any, what, change ought to be made in the right of franking.

Some conversation took place on this resolution, between Mr. RHEA and Mr. EPPES, in respect to its object.

Mr. RHEA opposed the proposed reference, desiring the subject in the first instance to be referred to the Postmaster General; and, after his report, to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, who properly had charge of all subjects relating to revenue.

Mr. EPPES, in assigning reasons for his motion, stated, that the increase about to take place, of fifty per cent. on the present rates of postage, would operate as an increase of fifty per cent. on the present compensation of postmasters, which probably was not necessary. He had also understood that great abuses had grown out of the privilege of franking, insomuch that the office had been accepted in some instances as a sinecure, to save the expense of postage, by those who performed no duties of the office; and that the office had even, in one instance, been bestowed on a member of this House.

The motion of Mr. E. was agreed to finally, without opposition.

MILITIA DRAUGHTS.

The bill from the Senate, to call upon the several States and Territories for their respective quotas of 80,430 militia for the defence of the frontiers against invasion, was read a third time as amended.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee, who last addressed the House on the subject of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maryland, expressed a deliberate opinion that the bill on your table is not only unconstitutional, but, in point of energy and efficiency, in its principles and provisions, is not adequate to the public exigencies; and gave a decided preference to the one reported by the chairman of the Military Committee, on the part of this House, pursuant to the plan submitted by the Secretary at War. He farther said, that an act, embracing principles equally vigorous with those exhibited in the plan of the Secretary, ought to be passed; and those who should oppose it, if successful, would ruin the country.

Sir, in my mind, Congress have no right, by the Constitution, to exercise the powers considered as belonging to them in the Secretary's plan; and to pass an act comporting with them, will be a gross and outrageous violation of the personal rights of our citizens, inconsistent with the privileges of freemen, the principles of our Government, and will strike a deadly blow at American liberty; and, according to my apprehension, those who advocate the principles embraced in the Secretary's plan, and attempt to execute them, and not those who resist them, will ruin their country. That I am sincere in my opinion, and serious in my apprehensions, I call Heaven to witness. In passing such a law, it appears to me as clear as any legal or moral position, which was ever stated, that we overstep the bounds of the Constitution, and assume a power which we have no right to exercise. And where the Constitution ends, tyranny begins. If power can be assumed for one purpose, it may be for another. And if necessity, the tyrant's plea, can justify the exercise of unconstitutional power in one case, it will do it in all cases. It is in the nature of man to have an avidity of power, and to scramble for the possession of it, and to think it ever safe in his hands. This remark applies with justice to men of all parties. Gentlemen of the majority, whatever their opinions once might have been, now seem to have no objection to extreme power, provided it can be lodged in them, and exercised their own way.

The propensity on the part of the Executive, to grasp power by construction and otherwise; and the disposition on the part of the House, to assume power and surrender it, are truly alarming. If the citizens of the United States can be forced from their families and domestic enjoyments, and placed in the ranks of the regular Army, and marched out of the United States for foreign conquest, or, as the Secretary expresses it, "to push the war into Canada," while we are dreaming of liberty, we are all slaves—we hold our liberty upon a tenure which renders it unworthy of the name. If we can be marched to Quebec, we may be sent to Gibraltar, the West Indies, or any quarter of the globe. Our Government, instead of being free and republican, is a military despotism, and the right of expatriation, contended for by some gentlemen, is of more value than all the other rights which we possess.

The exigencies of the country, I agree, are pressing, and those who are influenced by an honest zeal to serve it, do not merit reproach. But every feeling of impatience at Constitutional restraint, and every propensity to assume unconstitutional power, are germs of tyranny, and ought to be destroyed in embryo. Those rules which are established by the mind and the judgment, uninfluenced by passion, for the security of the rights and the liberties of the people, ought to be held sacred in times of convulsion and tempest. To restrain the passions of men, and the aggressions of power, in such times, is the purpose for which Constitutional rules were made; and he who feels an impatience of them, has the seeds of tyranny springing up in his heart. With the spirit and disposition in which the President and Secretary at War now interpret the Constitution, give them the hundred thousand men, contemplated in the Secretary's plan, to help them explain it, in time to come; and, shocking as the thought may be, I will venture to predict, that our free institutions will not survive it, and that a second election of President will never take place.

Sir, I may be told that these powers can be exercised only in time of war; that war can be declared by the Legislature only, by the representatives of a free people; and that it will never be done, excepting in such a state of things as makes the public good unequivocally demand it. Sir, in theory it would seem that we have some security in the form of our Constitution, against the declaration of improvident, unjust and unnecessary wars; but, in practice, it has been proved we have none. We find, by experience, that a war, marked with as much folly and injustice, and coupled with as much hazard, as it respects the citizens of the country which declared it, as ever disgraced any despot on earth, can be declared by a Republican Government.

The war in which we are engaged was said to be declared in defence of sailors' rights. Those rights were violated on the Ocean, and do not admit of adequate defence elsewhere. The defenceless state of our seacoast, of two thousand miles extent, was well known by our Government; and to what it was exposed by the war, we may see by what some parts of it have already suffered. The views of the President, as to the comparative force of our country, and the country against which we declared war, and the means possessed of mutual annoyance, may be learned by recurring to the instructions which he gave to our Ambassadors at Ghent. Alluding to the remark contained in the declaration of the Prince Regent, that, in impressing British seamen from American vessels, Great Britain exercised no right which she was not willing to acknowledge as appertaining equally to the United States, with respect to American seamen, in British merchant ships, the President observes: "The semblance of equality, however, in this proposition, which strikes at first view, disappears on a fair examination. Impressment is not an American practice, but utterly repugnant to our Constitution and laws. The exercise of a right in common at sea by two nations, the one powerful, and the other comparatively weak, would be to put the latter completely at the mercy of the former. But, should the United States be permitted to make impressments from British vessels, the effect would be unequal. Great Britain has, perhaps, thirty ships of war at sea, to one of the United States, and would profit of the arrangement in that proportion." We here have the President's view of the comparative force and means of annoyance of our country, and the country with which we are at war.

The Founder of our Religion, "who spake as never man spake," when on earth, in a discourse designed to enforce on his hearers the importance of observing a due proportion between their means and their ends, their efforts and their objects, puts several interrogatories, which imply strong negative answers. Among other things he asks, "What king, going to make war against another king, sitteth not down first and consulteth whether he be able with ten thousand to meet him that cometh against him with twenty thousand?" The manner in which this question is put, implies an answer, that no king could be so lost to his own security, and the interest of his subjects. More than eighteen centuries have rolled away, since this interrogatory was put; and I believe history, before the commencement of the war in which we are engaged, does not furnish us with evidence of such an event. This deed of madness and folly, which mocked and set credulity at defiance, was reserved for the commission of a President of the United States and an American Congress, the Government of a free people!

The able and critical examination of my honorable friend from New Jersey (Mr. Strockton) of the details of the bill on your table, and of the powers of Congress to "call forth the militia," and his luminous and logical argument on these points, has superseded the necessity of any farther attention to these topics. He has exhausted the subject. Any auxiliary arguments which my humble efforts could furnish, in support of his positions, would be like valets-de-chambre in an army; they would add something to the number, but nothing to the strength. He has demonstrated, with a degree of clearness and perspicuity, which no unprejudiced mind can resist, that this bill provides for calling forth the militia for a purpose not contemplated by the Constitution; for retaining them, when called out, for a period not limited by either of the occasions, on which they can constitutionally be called out; and that the bill is a piece of machinery or instrument of torture, not warranted by the Constitution, to compel militiamen to enlist themselves or procure others to enlist into the regular Army. The attacks which have been made upon his arguments, may aptly be compared to the waves of the troubled sea, dashing against a mighty rock, and falling in gentle murmurs at its foot.

Though I bow with great respect to the argument of my honorable friend, upon the unconstitutionality of this bill, and agree with him in the facts which he has stated, with reference to the public Treasury, the ranks of the Army, the necessity of defending the country, and the impracticability of doing it without money, yet I do not accord with him in opinion as to the propriety or the practice of voting for all Constitutional laws, which have for their object the supplying the Government of the United States with men and money. That the Treasury is empty, I admit; that the ranks of the regular Army are thin, I believe to be true; and that our country must be defended, in all events, I not only admit, but affirm. But, sir, if all the parts of the United States are defended, of course the whole will be defended. If every State in the Union, with such aid as she can obtain from her neighbors, defends herself, our whole country will be defended. In my mind, the resources of the States will be applied with more economy, and with greater effect in defence of the country, under the State Governments, than under the Government of the United States. Besides, what assurances have we, if funds are placed in the hands of the present Administration, that they will be applied in defence of the country? None at all. The immense sums which have heretofore been drawn from the States, have been expended with unexampled profligacy, in wild, unsettled projects of foreign conquest; while the fairest and most important parts of our country have been left defenceless. The views of the Administration are "to push the war into Canada." Shall we pass all the supply bills, beneath the weight of which your table groans, draw all the funds of the States from them, and then leave them, thus exhausted, to the mercy of the enemy? This, in my mind, is unjust, and against the duty which we owe to the States. Money is as necessary to their defence, as to that of the United States. Under these impressions, I have uniformly voted against granting supplies to the Government of the United States, and shall continue to do it, until I have probable grounds for believing they will be judiciously applied in defence of the country. The people of the several States ought not to be compelled to pay for protection, unless it is afforded them by the United States. Shall Massachusetts be compelled to contribute to the common stock, from which she is allowed to draw nothing? When she is denied a reimbursement of necessary expenses, incurred in securing that protection which the United States owes her and has refused to afford, ought she to exhaust her treasury, to fill that of the United States? Surely not.

Before the debate on this bill commenced, the plan of the Secretary at War, for filling the ranks of the regular Army, had been laid before this House, and a bill founded upon that plan had been reported by our Military Committee, and committed to the same Committee of the whole House to which this bill was committed; and gentlemen who have preceded me in the debate on this bill, seem to have considered everything which relates to calling forth the militia, or filling the ranks of the regular Army, as an issue; and the principles involved in the Secretary's plan have been advocated by some, and repudiated by others, according to their several opinions. I shall therefore make no apology for assuming the same latitude.

The gentlemen who attempt to support the constitutionality of this bill, and of the Secretary's plan, contend that Congress, by the Constitution, "have power to raise armies, without limitation as to the mode;" that the important and extensive duties of "providing for the common defence, promoting the general welfare, and securing the blessings of liberty," are assigned to Congress, and because these are made their duties, it is contended they must have powers commensurate with them.

Sir, I cannot suppress my astonishment, when I hear gentlemen quote the preamble of our Constitution, as an authority to exercise the powers contemplated in the Secretary's plan. It appears to me to make directly against them. Under a Constitution expressly formed for the purpose of securing the blessings of civil liberty, they claim the right of exercising a power inconsistent with the first principles of civil liberty, and repugnant to the genius and nature of our Government. If Congress have such a power, we are not freemen.

"To provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty," are mentioned in the preamble of the Constitution as objects and ends which the people had in view, in giving the powers which they did give, and not as a designation of powers which were to be given. They were expressed as an admonition to after legislators, how to exercise their powers, and to restrain them from passing laws founded upon such principles as are embraced in the Secretary's plan, and not to justify it. "The common defence, general welfare, and securing the blessings of liberty," are a pole star, or constellation, to direct Congress in their course, and in the application of the powers which are expressly given them by the Constitution. Sir, I do not know of any express provision in the Constitution, that Congress shall have power "to provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty." To say that Congress have all powers which they may deem necessary to accomplish these objects, and that they are not restrained by the powers expressly given, is, in effect, to say there is no limit to their powers; that our Constitution is a mere carte blanche. But, sir, if powers were given in the general terms before mentioned, (which, however, is not the case,) and afterwards particular powers were expressed, the general powers would be controlled and restrained by the special. This is an established rule in the construction of all instruments. If A gives to B a letter of attorney, in which he constitutes him his agent, to represent him in all courts, and to transact all his concerns, and then proceeds to give powers to do special acts, in a particular manner, the general powers are controlled and restrained by the special.

The true construction of the provision in the Constitution, that "Congress shall have power to raise and support armies," is, that Congress shall have authority, or it shall be lawful for them to do it; not that they may use power or force, to coerce or compel the citizens to enter the regular army. Congress have power to establish post offices and make postroads; but no person ever supposed that they could chain the citizens to wheelbarrows, and make them work against their will. The power of Congress to raise armies must be exercised in such a manner as is consistent with the people enjoying "the blessings of civil liberty."

Though the Government of the United States cannot claim any power by implication or construction, being prohibited from doing it by the Constitution, yet the same cannot be said of the State governments or the people. It is admissible and fair to infer what they meant to reserve in one case, by what they refuse to give in another. That the people and the States did not intend to give Congress power by force to compel the citizens, our fathers, brothers, and children, to enter the regular Army, destined for foreign conquest, under United States' officers, is clearly to be inferred, from their refusing to place the militia under United States' officers when forced into the service, even in case of invasion, the most pressing exigency that can possibly happen.

What powers the people and the several States thought it was necessary to give to Congress, and what they did give, is to be learned from the spirit of the times in which the Constitution was formed, from the views and motives which induced the people to form it, and from a fair construction of the Constitution itself, taking it all together.

When the Constitution was formed and adopted, a jealousy of the military power of the United States, and a caution as to what they should part with, were predominant feelings in the people of all the States. A consolidated military Government was the object of fearful apprehensions. The State Governments had been tried, and were familiar to the people, and a more general confidence was placed in them than that of the United States, of which they had made no experiment. The "blessings of civil liberty" were thought much more secure, without giving to Congress an unlimited power of the sword, than they would be if that were the case. Let the people of Massachusetts have been told, that Congress, if the Constitution were adopted, would have power to raise regular armies, against the opinion of their State Legislature, for foreign conquest, or any other purpose, and that their parents, themselves, and their children, could be forced into the ranks, under the command of United States' officers, and be subject to martial law, and the discipline, severity, and the privations of a camp; and the Constitution, instead of being suffered to lie on the table for consideration, would have been thrown under it. They would have said, we have fought for "the blessings of civil liberty," and we will not adopt a Constitution which will seal our slavery. The people of Massachusetts would have said, on such an occasion, what the people of Virginia did on one less warrantable, "We will secede from the Union, and be left to the protection and government of a hundred thousand free independent citizens."

In the express provisions of the Constitution, a hedge was intended to be set about the citizens of the several States, to guard them against the incursions of the military powers of the United States. The wisdom of that precaution is now manifest. If the United States could command the military power of all the States, they would endanger and could easily destroy any individual State. This was foreseen, and the power withheld. Even the qualified authority which is given to Congress by the Constitution, "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," requires that the soldiers should be placed under officers appointed by the States. This reservation was made by the States to guard their citizen soldiers against oppressive power, to secure to the State Governments the attachment of the officers, and guard the State against a misapplication of their military force, and prevent it from being turned against them. Can any one believe when the people, in case of invasion, the most trying emergency which can happen, gave the United States power to call forth the militia under State officers only, that they intended to put the whole people of the several States at the disposal of the Government of the United States, and expose them to be forced into the regular Army, under United States' officers, in whose appointment they had no agency, and under whose command they would find no mercy; and this for the purpose of foreign conquest? No, sir! It is a doctrine too absurd and inconsistent to find support in any unprejudiced mind. We may as well suppose that they would have trembled at the yelping of a lapdog, and felt no terrors at the roaring of lions; that they would have strained at a gnat and swallowed a camel.

All those who labor to support the right of Congress to exercise the powers contemplated in the Secretary's plan, in my mind, fall into one common error. Instead of considering the Government of the United States as a Government of limited jurisdiction, possessing such powers only as are expressly given, they consider it as a Government of general jurisdiction, and as having all powers which are not denied.

All powers not expressly given to Congress by the Constitution, are reserved to the States or to the people. If the powers given are not adequate to the public exigencies (which I do not admit to be the case,) it is not the fault of Congress, who are the mere agents of the people, and accountable to them for the fair and faithful exercise of such powers only as are given to them. To say that it is necessary, or highly convenient to the defence of the country, that Congress should have the powers contemplated in the Secretary's plan, and therefore, that they have them, is very illogical. It is like arguing from right to fact, or from fact to right, which is never admissible. Whether or not it would have been better, according to the ideas which the majority now seem to have, that the United States should have been consolidated, and the independence of the States annihilated, and Congress possess all power, even the power of acting immediately upon the people for all military and civil purposes, it is of no importance to inquire. We do not sit here to alter the Constitution, or make a new one, but to administer it, according to its form and effect, as the people, from whom all power proceeds, and for whose benefit it is to be exercised, have made it.

For the purposes of defence, the State Governments have a right to command the services of all their citizens who are able to render any; but no Government under heaven has a right to compel the citizens of our country to enter the regular Army, under United States' officers, for the purpose of "pushing the war into Canada," or for the purpose of any foreign conquest, whatever. Such a power is at war with the vital spirit of our Constitution, and the first principles of civil liberty.

Sir, according to the principles of the Secretary's plan, and the provisions of the bill, which have been attempted to be defended in the present debate, the soldiers may be wholly drawn from one section of the United States, and the officers appointed from another. The legislators, the judges, and the freemen of the Eastern States, against their consent, may be placed under the command of minions and striplings from distant States. This may be thought to be a vision of fancy, a delusion of the mind; but, judging from appointments which have heretofore been made, we could not expect that more attention would be paid to our feelings or our interest, in a certain section of our country, than such a state of things would exhibit. As I am unwilling to be thought to make railing accusations, without evidence to support them, I shall trouble the House with the statement of a few facts, which fully maintain the suggestions which I have made.

Not to mention the embarrassments experienced by Massachusetts in defending against the enemy (which have been fully stated by my honorable friend, Mr. KING) arising from the President's sending a General, in whom the Government of the United States had practically said they had no confidence, to command on one of the most important stations, the case of Colonel Loring ought not to pass unnoticed. Some few years since, he commanded a company of militia in the town of Boston, and was chargeable with many acts of insubordination and unmilitary conduct, for which he was arrested. As a military man, he was a common mover of sedition and disorder. A court martial was legally appointed, and consisted of officers of both political parties. By the unanimous voice of the court, he was found guilty, and by their sentence disqualified for holding any military office (if I mistake not) for five years; and the sentence was approved by the supreme Executive of Massachusetts. Before this disability was removed, he received a colonel's commission from the President, and was sent to exercise his command in the very section in which he had received his sentence of disqualification, and, as I have been informed, over one of the officers who sat on his trial. This was an affront and an insult to the constituted authorities of Massachusetts, and to power legally exercised; and while the President thus practises himself, he cannot expect that his authority and jurisdiction will be respected by others. The embarrassments which the appointments to which I allude occasioned to the Government of Massachusetts, in their late measures of defence, were much more than a counterbalance for any aid they have received from the Government of the United States.

The express provision in the Constitution, that the States shall appoint the officers of the militia, when called into actual service, is considered as a strong argument against the right of Congress to exercise the powers contemplated in the Secretary's plan, and the train of reasoning he has adopted to get over it is extraordinary indeed. He admits that if the mode of raising an army which he proposes, "draws men from the militia service and places them under regular officers, the principles of the Constitution are violated." In the execution of the Secretary's plan, men will be forcibly drawn from the militia and placed in the regular Army, under the United States' officers. This I hold to be indisputably the case. The grounds upon which it is contended that such will not be the operation of the Secretary's plan, are, that the men are drawn from the population of the country, and not from the militia.

Sir, does not the population of the country embrace the militia? Is it not a well settled maxim in philosophy, law, and common sense, that the greater contains the less, and that the whole embraces all the parts? If one part, and that from which military force would most probably be attempted to be drawn, is guarded and secured by the Constitution, can you take the whole without violating the provision which secures the part? Certainly you cannot. The population of the country embraces the militia, and more also; and because the power proposed to be exercised is not limited to the militia, it is said to be Constitutional, though it is admitted that it would not be so if it were thus limited. If you cannot touch a part, unless it be sub modo, you cannot touch the whole, which includes that part, unless it be subject to the same limitation. But, sir, Congress have no power over the population, for military purposes, excepting it be "to organize them as militia, and arm and discipline them," and when thus organized, to call them forth for the purposes expressed by the Constitution, under officers appointed by the States.

If the bill on your table is unconstitutional, resistance is not only lawful, but it is a duty. To resist usurped power, is as high a duty as to submit to power lawfully exercised; and the freemen of the East will much sooner incur the penalties of an unconstitutional law, than the guilt of treachery to their country and posterity. We have heard much from some of the majority, "of the power of Government, of rebellion, and of crisis." Sir, far be it from me to do anything to invite or hasten crises, but if they are forced upon the citizens of this country, when they are defending "the blessings of civil liberty," they will be met with that fortitude which conscious integrity inspires, and the power of the Government, exerted in an unjust cause, will be found to be impotent.

From the language of some gentlemen, I should suppose they imagine, that persons in authority have a right to use any powers which they may deem necessary to accomplish lawful ends, and are not restrained or limited to Constitutional means, and that resistance, in all cases, would be rebellion.

"Whoever in authority," said the great Mr. Locke, "exceeds his powers, acts without authority, and may be opposed as any other man who invades rights." Upon its being observed, that "to tell the people they may oppose power when perverted or misapplied, will lead to rebellion," the same great man replied, "you may as well say, to tell honest men they may oppose robbers and pirates will lead to disorder and bloodshed." When the famous Selden was asked, "by what statutes resistance to tyranny could be justified," he answered: "It is to be justified by the custom and usage of England, which is the law of the land." "We are to support the Crown," says Bolingbroke, "with our lives and fortunes, while it keeps within bounds, and protects us, and no longer." "This is so well settled," as he expresses it, "that conscience has no occasion to battle with the understanding." "A King," says Mr. Erskine, "has no more authority to exceed his power, than a constable." If Government usurp a power, not given by the Constitution, they are wrong doers, and responsible for the consequences.

In the Secretary's explanatory observations, it is said, that "Congress had a right, by the Constitution, to raise regular armies, and no restraint is imposed in the exercise of it;" that "it would be absurd to suppose that Congress could not carry this power into effect, otherwise than by accepting the voluntary services of individuals"—and that "it might happen that an army could not be raised in that mode, whence the power would have been granted in vain."

Sir, it will never happen in a country like ours, that a wise and provident Administration cannot raise an army, without resorting to force, when the interest of the nation requires that they should have one. In a war just, necessary, and expedient, and wisely conducted, one in which the feelings of the people are engaged, armies will be raised with great facility. In any other war the Government ought not to have an army. Our Government is a Government of the people, was made for the people, for the good of the many, and not to support the pride, the weak or wicked policy, or the passions of the few. War never ought to be declared by a Government like ours, excepting for causes of such magnitude, and for injuries of such a nature, as to cause a general excitement. After having legislated for years upon principles hostile to the interests of the people, and destructive of their attachment to the Government, to expect that the people would rally round the Government, and fight with enthusiasm, betrays a want of knowledge of men, and of the nature of our free institutions.

The Secretary further observes, that "long continued invasions, conducted by well disciplined troops, can best be repelled by troops kept constantly in the field, and equally well disciplined;" that "the framers of the Constitution, and the States who ratified it, knew the advantage which an enemy might have over us by regular forces, and intended to place their country on an equal footing;" and so he concludes the Government have a right to raise such troops by compulsion.

If our Government can adopt such reasoning as this, and reduce it to practice, our citizens will soon find themselves in chains of despotism. "The framers of the Constitution, and the States who adopted it," also well knew that an attack made upon our country by the energies and undivided efforts of a foreign despot, could most effectually be resisted by despotic and arbitrary power; and it may as fairly be contended that, in time of war, it was intended by "the framers of the Constitution," that the President, to whom the command of the Army and Navy is given, should have all the power of a Roman Dictator. No doubt if one individual wielded the whole physical force, and commanded the whole resources of the country, in time of war, we could more successfully invade foreign countries, and more promptly defend our own. "The pace of snail," in which the American Congress moves, is not well suited to the energies and quick-time step of military operations. But with power in the President, so well suited to war, what would become of us in peace? We might then be oppressed with as much facility as we could be defended in war. To guard against oppression, the powers of Government are wisely limited by the people, and every branch of the Government, at their peril, must keep within the bounds prescribed. If we have free institutions, and enjoy "the blessings of civil liberty," we cannot possess all the despotic energies in war. This our Government ought to have considered before war was declared.

The President, through his Ministry, declares to us "that the nature of the crisis in which we are involved, and the extent of our danger, require particular attention; that we are contending for existence, and must make great exertions, and suffer great sacrifices; that we are called upon for a display of all that patriotism which distinguished us in the first great struggle; that we must relinquish no right, or perish in the struggle."

Is this a true picture of the state of our country? Are we contending for existence? Are we called upon for a display of those spasms of patriotism exhibited in our great struggle? How came we in this situation? By whose agency, and for what causes, were we thus involved? The same Government, the same men, involved us in the war, which is the cause of all the evils and calamities which await us, who now tell us and the world, that the principle in support of which they said the war was declared is not worth a serious contest. The same men who now call upon us to surrender our lives, our personal liberty, our children, and everything which is dear to us, to extricate our country from the state of wretchedness in which they have involved us, now, in effect, admit, that after the revocation of the British Orders in Council there was no adequate cause for prosecuting the war. It is true, as is said, after the peace in Europe, the principles of impressment, for which our enemy contend, "will have no practical effect;" but what were we told when the war was declared? It was then resounded from one end of the continent to the other, that the war was a war for principle; that sailors' rights were to be established on a basis eternal. No man supposed, from the representations of the supporters of the war, that the blood and treasure which were expended were to avert the current sufferings by impressment during the war in Europe. Every one knew that the evils of one year of war would be greater than those of a century, resulting from impressment, in the manner in which it was practised when the war was declared. Gentlemen may disguise it as they will, still the passions, the feelings, and the motives which led to the war, will be rightly apprehended and fully understood by our enlightened citizens. Sir, the causes of the war, the motives which influenced our Government when they declared it, the conquest of Canada, and everything relating to these subjects, have become to me extremely disgusting. I have no pleasure in entering upon them, even for the purpose of justly reproaching the authors of the war, though the baneful effects of it meet my eyes in every direction. But, sir, when I hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania say, "he had not the honor of voting for the war, not being a member when it was declared;" when I hear him speak of "a morbid neutrality," and hear him ask "what situation would our country have been in had war not been declared?" implying that he thinks the war a blessing; when I view the picture of the distresses of our country, as described by the Government; when I look around upon my fellow-citizens and neighbors, and contrast their present with their situation before the war; when I see persons and families who were then in flourishing and happy circumstances, moving over the earth in a step so light as scarcely to touch it—when I see the same persons, in consequence of disasters which have grown out of the war, now moving in the solemn step of a funeral procession, poor as death, and gloomy as the grave; when I behold the silence of midnight pervade our commercial cities, where the busy hum of industry was heard in every street, I cannot repress my feelings. Many tears of blood have been shed in consequence of the war, and scenes have been acted, which none but minds blinded by infatuation, and hearts impenetrable by pity, and insensible to feelings of remorse, can contemplate without horror. Those who think that the happiness of the people deserves more consideration than the pride of mistaken rulers will readily admit that it is much to be regretted that war was declared.*

*The following extracts from a letter of the celebrated patriot, Edmund Burke, to the sheriffs of Bristol, on American affairs, in 1777, needs no comment to show their application to the supporters and opposers of the present war:

"Indeed our affairs are in a bad condition. I do assure those gentlemen who have prayed for war, and obtained the blessing they have sought, that they are at this instant in very great straits.

"The events of this war are of so much greater magnitude than those who either wished or feared it, ever looked for, that this alone ought to fill every considerate mind with anxiety and diffidence. Wise men often tremble at the very things which fill the thoughtless with security. Whether you are yet wholly out of danger from them is more than I know, or than your rulers can divine; but even if I were certain of my safety, I could not easily forgive those who had brought me into the most dreadful perils, because by accidents, unforeseen by them or me, I have escaped. A conscientious man would be cautious how he dealt in blood; he would feel some apprehensions of being called to a tremendous account, for engaging in so deep a play, without any sort of knowledge of the game. I cannot conceive any existence under Heaven,

We are told "that the result of the contest cannot be doubtful." If further contest must take place, it is my wish that the prediction may prove true. But I want something more to rest my hopes upon than the prophecies of the present Administration, or their ability to conduct the war. Their predictions, heretofore, have proved illusory and vain; and I believe history does not furnish an example of funds so extensive being expended, and means so extensive exhausted, and so little effect produced. If the Administration have the talents requisite for conducting the war, why has not more been done? It is said that this is a war of the nation, and not of a party; that a great majority of the people, the substantial yeomanry, the physical strength of the country, are with the Government. All the laws have been passed for raising men and money, which the supporters of the war have required. If the war is popular, at least four millions of people, a greater number than the whole population of the country in the Revolutionary war, must be heart and hand with the Administration. The purses, even of the Opposition, have been open to the

(which in the depths of its wisdom tolerates all sorts of things,) that it is more truly odious and disgusting, than an impotent, helpless creature, without civil wisdom, or military skill, bloated with pride and arrogance, calling for battles which he is not to fight, contending for a dominion which he can never exercise, and satisfied to be himself mean and miserable, in order to render others wretched.

"If you and I find our talents not of the great and ruling kind, our conduct at least is conformable to our faculties. No man's life pays the forfeit of our rashness. No desolate widow weeps tears of blood over our arrogance.

"I know many have been taught to think that moderation in a case like this is a sort of treason, and that all arguments for it are sufficiently answered by charging all the present or future miseries which we may suffer on the resistance of our brethren. But I would wish them in this grave matter, and if peace is not wholly removed from their hearts, to consider seriously that to criminate and recriminate never yet was the road to reconciliation in any difference among men. If measures of peace are necessary, they must begin somewhere; and a conciliatory temper must precede and prepare every plan of reconciliation. Nor do I conceive that we suffer anything by thus regulating our minds; we are not disarmed by being disencumbered of our passions. This outrageous language which has been encouraged, and kept alive by every art, has already done incredible mischief.

"If I had not lived long enough to be little surprised at anything, I should have been in some degree astonished at the continued rage of several gentlemen, who, not satisfied with carrying fire and sword into another country, are animated nearly with the same fury against those neighbors of theirs, whose only crime it is that they have charitably and humanely wished them to entertain more reasonable sentiments, and not always to sacrifice their interest to their passion. All this rage against unresisting dissent, convinces me that at bottom they are far from satisfied they are in the right. For what is it they would have? A war! They certainly have, at this moment, the blessing of something that is very like one. Is it the force of the nation they call for? they have it already; and if they choose to fight their battles in their own persons nobody prevents their marching with the next expedition. Do they think the service is stunted for the want of liberal supplies? Indeed they complain without reason. The table of the House will glut them, let their appetite for expense be ever so keen.

The President, through his Minister, says: "The United States must give up no right, or perish in the struggle."

These were not the sentiments of Alexander the Deliverer, at the Treaty of Tilsit; and we have seen the fruits and effects of the wisdom of Romanzoff, in negotiating that treaty, wonderfully displayed in the battle of Borodino, and in the after events of Europe. No wise Government, despotic or republican, ever held such language, or practised upon such a principle. A mad adherence to this principle hurried Bonaparte from the government of the fairest part of Europe to that speck of creation, the island of Elba. What, yield nothing! give up no right, however unimportant, even to quiet the reasonable fears of our enemy! not even be at peace with "our red brethren," and suffer those children of nature to moment, the blessing of something that is very like one. Is it the force of the nation they call for? they have it already; and if they choose to fight their battles in their own persons nobody prevents their marching with the next expedition. Do they think the service is stunted for the want of liberal supplies? Indeed they complain without reason. The table of the House will glut them, let their appetite for expense be ever so keen.

"In order to produce this favorite unanimity in delusion, and to prevent all possibility of a return to our ancient happy concord, arguments for our continuance in this course are drawn from the wretched situation itself into which we have been betrayed. It is said that, being at war, all the policy we have left is to strengthen the hand of Government. On the principle of this argument, the more mischiefs we suffer from Administration, the more our trust in it is to be confirmed.

"Let them but once get us into a war, and then their power is safe, and an act of oblivion passed for all their misconduct. Accordingly, the least resistance to power appears more inexcusable in their eyes than the great abuses of authority. All dread of a standing military force, is looked upon as a superstitious panic; and we are taught to believe that a desire of domineering over our countrymen is love to our country.

"It is impossible that we should remain long in a situation which breeds such notions and dispositions without some great alteration in the national character. Many things have been long operating towards a gradual change in our principles; but this war has done more in a few years than all the other causes could have effected in a century. It is, therefore, not on its own separate account, but because of its attendant circumstances, that I consider its continuance, or its ending in any way but that of an honorable and liberal accommodation, as the greatest evil that can befall us; for that reason I entreat you, again and again, neither to be persuaded, shamed, or frightened out of the principles that have hitherto led so many of you to abhor the war."

enjoy undisturbed, a small portion of the lands which the God of nature gave them! The proudest Monarchs, in their proudest days, have often, for the sake of peace, given up rights not important to their security, to quiet the fears of a weaker neighbor. Louis XIV, when more powerful than any Monarch in Europe, for the sake of peace, and to quiet the fears of the English and Dutch, agreed to destroy his fortifications at Dunkirk. The English, when they were conquerors, to obtain peace, and quiet the fears of Spain, agreed to demolish their forts near the Bay of Honduras. No wise Government, to avoid a present contest, will surrender rights which will weaken itself essentially, or give an accession of power to its enemy which will operate a serious disadvantage in future contests. These general observations I have thought it not improper to make; as negotiation for peace is pending, I will not be more particular.

Sir, I am not a little surprised at the reproaches which have been cast upon the Government and people of Massachusetts, for suffering a part of her territory to be captured, and hitherto to remain in possession of the enemy. It is the more extraordinary, as the censure comes from members of a Government to whom she has paid the price of protection, and from whom she has a right to demand it. It is owing to the providence of the Government of the United States that the enemy now possesses the territory to which allusion is had. A small portion of the millions drawn from Massachusetts, and wasted by dishonest agents, or expended in mad projects, if it had been laid out in building fortifications, and placing garrisons in them, would have prevented even a temporary loss of this territory. If the United States declare to New England that they cannot protect them, and that all expectations of the General Government doing their duty are mere delusions, Massachusetts will use her means to better purposes than the United States have employed them. Since the adoption of the Constitution, more money has been received from Massachusetts by the United States than they have been able to beg or borrow, even at an enormous premium, of their partisans and supporters; in return for which, for twelve years past, she has received nothing but injuries. Moreover, the place invaded is nearly three hundred miles from Massachusetts proper, and her whole intermediate seacoast, three hundred miles in extent, has been left unprotected by the United States, whose duty it was to provide for their defence; and even her capital, daily in expectation of invasion, was wholly neglected by the General Government. In this situation it did not comport with the wisdom and sound policy of the supreme Executive of Massachusetts, to draw his troops from the capital of his State into the wilds of the District of Maine, to rescue a portion of its territory from a possession of the enemy, which, as it respects the most of it, is merely nominal, and leave the capital of the State to be sacked and destroyed by the enemy. Acts of folly and weakness of this description are the exclusive right of another Executive. Sir, I desire, with suitable feelings and emotions, to thank my God, that the capital of Massachusetts has not been invaded. Had it been so ordered, even if we had been victorious, victory might have been purchased with blood, precious to me as my own. In the event of an invasion, which I pray God to avert, I believe that the rebellious people of Boston, and their brethren in the vicinity, would look at Bunker's Hill, and at their enemy, and that very different materials would be furnished for the pages of future history, from those furnished by the President of the United States, and his loyal subjects of this patriotic section, in the Hudibrastic victory which he obtained in the memorable battle of Bladensburg—

"When the fight becomes a chase,
"He wins the fight who wins the race."

Sir, I do not like to draw geographical lines, or make sectional comparisons. Discussions of this nature are never invited or commenced by me. But when gentlemen from other States question the prowess or patriotism of Massachusetts, I must be permitted to remind them of what the history of our country will prove, that a force, equal to that which overran whole States in the South, and chased Legislators from their seats into the mountains after the first gun was fired, were never able to penetrate into Massachusetts the distance of cannon shot from her shores.

Although I have already occupied the floor too long, I cannot quit it without expressing the high gratification which I felt in hearing the remarks of two of the gentlemen from Kentucky, (Mr. HOPKINS and Mr. DUVAL,) who preceded me in this debate. To hear the mutual interests, the mutual wants and mutual supplies of the Eastern and Western States, and the adaptation of one to the other, and the legitimate and proper defence of the whole, a navy, recognised and described, in language so lively and so just, excited in my breast very pleasing emotions. I have witnessed nothing like it since I have had the honor of a seat in this House. The feelings of friendship and respect which were expressed for the people of the Eastern States were of a new impression. One of the gentlemen (Mr. DUVAL) mixed a little gall with his honey, and planted a few seeds of henbane and nightshade in his garden of spices; but upon that I shall not dwell.

When I consider the relative circumstances and situations of the Eastern, Southern, and Western States, and see how much of harmony and how little of opposition there is in their interests, and how happily they are calculated to relieve the mutual wants of each other, and to furnish mutual benefits, I am astonished at the seeds of bitterness which have sprung up among them. When inquiry is made how this happened, we may say, as it was said in Holy Writ, when the tares were found among the wheat, "an enemy hath done it." In my mind, a few prominent, influential men in our country, too ardent friends of one foreign nation, and too inveterate haters of another; enemies to commerce, to a navy, to the fisheries, and to everything excepting the terra firma of our country, whatever their views may have been, were the founders of the mistaken and ruinous policy of our Government, and of course sowed the seeds of the heartburnings and ill blood among our citizens, and of all the evils which await our country.*

If a reconciliation ever takes place between our citizens, and between the different sections of our country, it must commence somewhere, and most clearly it ought to commence with the majority. If a system of measures calculated to save our country, and not partaking of the spirit of party, should be proposed by them and rejected by the minority, the majority have the power of votes to enforce their own measures, and without mortification can say to the minority, we can do without you; whereas the minority, destitute of this power, must approach the majority in the style of petitioners; a style which the majority have no right to expect they will assume, considering the state in which the measures of the majority, against admonitions and remonstrances, have involved their country.

MR. FARROW.—MR. SPEAKER, I will not, on the question of the passage of the bill on your table, detain you with my opinion in respect of either the justice or policy of the war that you are now engaged in, nor with the wisdom of the measures in which it has been prosecuted. The day for examining the propriety of the war is passed by. It must now be enough for me to know that war was Constitutionally declared, and that it has been conducted by the constituted authority. As man must be fallible, it is his province to err; and I have no wish to live under a Government where he is not allowed that privilege. However great may have been the errors of your Administration, it is, nevertheless, my boast and pride that I am a citizen of your Government. I would not exchange it for any other. While I wish all nations well, my own is the most dear to me. Influenced by these impressions, I will give you every support in my power to enable you to prosecute the war, until you can obtain a just and equitable peace.

It is contended by several honorable gentlemen that the principles of the bill are unconstitutional. The honorable gentleman from New Jersey, (MR. STOCKRON,) with great perspicuity, and with a strong discriminating mind, so contended. I subscribe to every principle that he contended for, and every position that he laid down; but he did not, nor cannot, apply them to the bill under consideration. When a case comes before you to which they can be applied I will vote with that gentleman. It is in this case, MR. SPEAKER, like all others, proper first to establish facts before you can properly apply principles. He states that the militia can only be called out by you, to either execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, or repel invasions. That is also my opinion. As I told you, we agree on principles, but how he came to the conclusion that this bill is not to call out the militia for either of those purposes I cannot tell. The facts, as I will show, will not authorize such a conclusion. Let us now examine what are the facts. We all know that, at this time, the enemy has possession of the town of Castine, and a large country around there, within the State of Massachusetts. Some of the forts on your Northern and Northwestern frontiers, some of the islands in the Chesapeake and on your Northern coasts, the enemy holds possession of. Now, under these circumstances, what is your duty marked out by the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States?

[Here MR. F. read from the said section: "To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and the naval forces; to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."]

Having in view this part of the Constitution, indulge me while I read the first section of the bill before you. "That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to call upon the Executives of the several States and Territories thereof, for their respective quotas of 80,000 militia, armed and equipped according to law, to serve for the term of one year, from the time of meeting at the place of rendezvous, unless sooner discharged." These are the principles of the bill; there is a provision in the bill, holding out an inducement to any man called out as a militiaman, to enlist and join the regular army. They may do so if they please; and so they may, whether this law is passed or not. If they go into the regular service, it must be by virtue of their voluntary contract. I did vote with those who wished to reduce the term of service, believing, as I do, that six months is as long as the militia ought to be called out from their homes and families. But a majority of this honorable body differs with me in opinion, and have fixed the term of service at twelve months. I will, therefore, vote for the bill, as I am not willing for the nation to strike her flag until the enemy will suffer you to rest in peace.

MR. GASTON said, he hoped he might be indulged with the attention of the House for a few minutes. It was not his purpose to wander over the extensive field of controversy, which had been opened on this occasion, but briefly to notice one or two interesting topics, which had not received the attention due to them. The bill on the table was such a singular nondescript that it was difficult to define its character. Its friends were generally solicitous that it should be regarded as an ordinary militia bill. A majority of the House had viewed it in the light of a bill imposing a direct tax, while he believed, with his friends around him, that it was a disingenuous and unwarrantable contrivance for compelling the militia to find recruits for the regular army. If the bill were to be regarded, as its friends wished, as an ordinary militia bill, one objection alone was sufficient to insure its rejection. It was utterly inefficient for the purposes it professed to have in view. As to other parts of the country, he would not speak decisively; but in that with which he was best acquainted, he would venture to assert, that the quota required by this bill could not be brought into the field, in conformity to its provisions, in less than twelve months after the requisition. Let these provisions be examined a moment. After the President has made his requisition upon the Executive of a State, the captain of every infantry company within it is to be instructed and required to enroll on his muster list the names of all persons within the local limits of his company, liable to do military duty, whether members of his own or any other military corps. When this enrolment is completed, every captain is to make a return thereof, by mail or otherwise, to the brigade-inspector of his brigade. When this officer has received the returns from all the captains of his brigade, he is then to make out and forward a return to the Adjutant General of the State, setting forth in it the numbers belonging to each regiment, battalion, and company. The Adjutant General, on receiving the returns of all the brigade inspectors, is to ascertain the number of men which each brigade, regiment, battalion, and company, ought to furnish towards making up the quota required. Having performed this arithmetical labor, he is then to communicate the result to the brigadiers throughout the State, who will parcel out so much of the intelligence as may be necessary to the commandants of regiments, who, in their turn, will issue orders to the captains with whom this process began. This business happily concluded, the captains will then divide their companies into classes, equal to half the number of persons whom they are to furnish, taking especial care that these classes shall contain the same number of persons and the same quantity of wealth. Each class will then, by draught or contract, furnish two soldiers. Then is to be resumed the task of reporting to brigade inspectors, who, in their turn, report again to the Adjutant General. When this second routine of returns is completed, the men who are to form the quota are known, and are to be organized by companies, battalions, regiments, brigades, and divisions, and to have their appropriate officers selected and commissioned. When it is recollected that many of the officers whose agency is essentially necessary to set this complicated machine in motion, (men appointed in the piping days of peace,) are very little acquainted with military duties generally, and will not be apt soldiers in learning the new duties assigned them, that they are scattered over an extensive territory, live remote from post offices, and are not in the habit of correspondence by mail, it is scarcely possible to doubt that many casualties and failures must occur to interrupt the regular transmission and return of their official communications. This will take place with the best intentions. But if some should be disposed not to co-operate zealously in the plan, how will you detect culpable omissions on their part? How prove the regular receipt of orders, intrusted to a conveyance well known to be uncertain, and probably delivered privately, if delivered at all, and without the power afterwards of distinctly recollecting the fact? If the militia are to be resorted to for the defence of this country, the utmost promptitude and despatch are essential. The emergency is immediate; so should be the call. Yet all our legislative energy is to be compressed into a scheme which will prevent the forthcoming of militia, until the occasion for their services is past. As a militia bill, that now before us is worse than nugatory. It is ruinous, trifling with the most important interests of the country.

But, sir, said Mr. G., I rose principally for another purpose; for a purpose which must interest the best feelings of every man who loves Constitutional freedom, or respects the memory of the man, "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." In the course of this discussion, the monstrous and detestable doctrine asserted by our Secretary of War, that the General Government has an uncontrolled power to force every American into the ranks of a regular army, has been maintained and combated with equal zeal, though with unequal argument. To the reasoning of my honorable friends I presume not to add anything. The jury before whom this issue is tried, the enlightened freemen of this country, cannot hesitate as to the verdict they are to pronounce. They are ready to declare the claim which has been advanced, is arbitrary, unconstitutional, and fitted only for the region of slavery. But recourse has been had to authority, and the name of WASHINGTON has been brought forward in this House to give sanction to doctrines utterly subversive of the principles of civil liberty, as if he had left on record one act, heretofore undiscovered by friend or foe, sufficient to tarnish all the fame of his illustrious actions, and to strike off his name from the list of the benefactors of mankind. Mine be the task to rescue from this unmerited imputation the memory of the man, whom, from infancy, I was taught to love and revere.

The doctrine of the Secretary of War, stated in its mildest form, is, that the United States have a right to draught men out of the militia, to fill the ranks of the regular Army. This doctrine is said to be explicitly advanced in a report of General Knox, while Secretary of War, and to have been distinctly approved by General Washington, to whom that report was submitted. If either of these positions be unfounded, the pretence of the authority of Washington must be abandoned. Both are unfounded.

And first, sir, admitting for a moment that General Knox's report intimates such a claim on the part of the General Government, on what evidence are we to pronounce that this claim obtained the sanction of General Washington?

It appears, that at the second session of the first Congress, under the present Constitution, when the head of the Executive Departments were presenting their respective plans upon the great subjects which came immediately under their view, when Hamilton was making his reports on public credit and a National Bank, Jefferson on the fisheries and other subjects, and Randolph upon the Judiciary Establishment, that General Knox, then Secretary of War, submitted his plan for the arrangement of the militia of the United States with a view to their effectual defence. This plan was presented to the President by Gen. Knox, with a letter, stating that it was substantially the same plan which had been prepared for the consideration of the late Congress, under whom he had also been Secretary of War, and had then been submitted to General Washington's examination. That the general principles of that plan having then met his approbation, with some exceptions, such modifications had been made as conformed to his suggestions.

This plan and letter the President sent to Congress, with the following Message:

"Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives :

"The Secretary of the Department of War has submitted to me certain principles, to serve as a plan for the general arrangement of the militia of the United States.

"Conceiving the subject to be of the greatest importance to the welfare of our country, and liable to be placed in various points of view, I have directed him to lay the plan before Congress for their information, that they may make such use thereof as they shall judge proper.

"GEORGE WASHINGTON.

"UNITED STATES, Jan. 21, 1790."

The Message and plan were referred by Congress to a Committee of the whole House, who did nothing in relation to it. Some months after it was laid before a select committee, who had been appointed to bring in a militia bill, and of its history I can discover no further trace.

It is obvious that General Knox's plan, from his own account of it, was constructed under the old Confederation, when the only authority of Congress to raise soldiers was by requisitions on the States, and when it could not therefore be contemplated to draught men into the regular Army, except by virtue of State authority, and through the medium of State regulations. In this plan, at the time it originated, General Washington had perceived military merit, and had suggested hints towards its further improvement. If afterwards, in attempting to accommodate this system to the purposes of the new Government, and to incorporate into it the former military suggestions of General Washington, Gen. Knox had unguardedly left in it any provision which would seem not suited to the powers of the new Government, it does not appear that such feature was ever brought to the distinct notice of the President. He submitted it to Congress, merely as a report from the Head of the War Department of a plan for a system of military defence, with a well-founded confidence that Congress would extract from it such provisions as they might deem useful, and were not beyond the sphere of their Constitutional powers.

But, sir, the egregious fallacy of this argument will be detected by an examination of the report itself. I have examined it attentively, and I pronounce unhesitatingly, that it does not contain the principle said to be found in it. Although detached passages of the report might seem to countenance the doctrine, which it is now relied on to support, yet when they are examined in connexion with each other, and with the context, it is demonstrable, that it holds forth no claim to draught men from the militia of the States into the regular Army of the United States. In the letter of General Knox, accompanying the plan, it is recommended as a national system of "defence;" and in the introduction, it claimed to be "the most efficient system of defence which may be compatible with the interests of a free people." He notices the prejudice which the modern practice of Europe has created in favor of standing armies. He expressed his opinion, that "a small corps of well-disciplined and well-informed artillerymen and engineers, and a legion for the protection of the frontiers and the magazines and arsenals, are all the Military Establishment which may be required for the present use of the United States; the privates of these corps to be enlisted, for a certain period, after the expiration of which to return to the mass of the citizens." He declares his conviction, that "an energetic national militia is to be regarded as the capital security of a free Republic." "If," in conformity to his recommendation, "it should be decided to reject a standing army, for the military branch of the Government, as possessing too fierce an aspect, and being hostile to the principles of liberty, it will follow that a well-constituted militia ought to be established." Then, taking as the principles of his plan these maxims which are applicable only to a militia defence, and declaring his purpose to be to carry into effect, not that power of the Government which relates to the raising of armies, but that which authorizes the United States "to provide for organizing and disciplining the militia, and for governing such parts of them as may be employed in the service of the United States; reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress," he brings forward his scheme of a national defence by means of militia only, without a recurrence to a regular army. It is not necessary to call the attention of the House to a minute examination of this scheme, for it is immaterial to the present question whether it was practicable and convenient or otherwise. It was a bold plan of militia organization and discipline. I hazard no opinion as to its correctness or utility. Its prominent features were, a division of all the militia into three corps; an advanced, a main, and a reserved corps; composed of individuals of different ages; giving to all these corps the legionary form; and a sub-division into sections for the more ready and equal compliance with every proper requisition. The reserved corps, consisting of persons of advanced age, was set apart for the domestic defence of each State, and was not to be obliged to furnish men, except in cases of actual invasion or rebellion near home. The advanced corps "were designed not only as a school in which the youth of the United States were to be instructed in the art of war; but they were in all cases of exigence to serve as an actual defence to the community." And "in all cases of invasion or rebellion, were, on requisition of lawful authority, obliged to march to any place within the United States." And when in the service of the United States, were to be allowed the same pay, "subsistence, clothing, and other allowance, as should be made to Federal troops under the same circumstances." The main corps, forming the principal defence of the country, either united with the reserve corps for domestic purposes, or "on sudden occasions, to which the advanced corps was incompetent," furnished thereto an adequate portion of its force "by means of its sections." Thus, in the language of General Knox, for a sum less than four hundred thousand dollars annually, an energetic national militia was to be durably established, the invaluable principles of liberty secured and perpetuated, and a dignified national fabric erected on the solid foundation of public virtue. Thus much for the ordinary organization of this national force, and for its application to those casual and fleeting purposes which might arise in a state of general tranquillity. But should any serious and permanent interruption of the public tranquillity, either from external or internal causes, require a more permanent and vigorous form to be given to this national force, this end was to be accomplished by requisitions on the States, which would be answered from the advanced and main corps by means of the sections. This, sir, is the obvious meaning of the clauses in this report, which have been relied on as warranting the doctrine of conscription. The clauses are these—"All requisitions for men to form an army, either for State or Federal purposes, shall be furnished by the advanced and main corps, by means of the sections." "The Executive government, or Commander-in-chief of the militia of each State, will assess the numbers required, on the respective legions of these corps." The army here intended is an army of militia, not of regulars; not procured by recruiting, still less by forcing men into the ranks, under the authority of the General Government, but obtained by means of requisitions on the States, sanctioned by their respective Executives. The requisitions must be understood to be such as are recognised in the Constitution, to repel invasions, suppress insurrections, and execute the laws of the United States. The officers of this army were contemplated to be militia officers, not Federal; for the report explicitly declares that the constitutions of the individual and United States having prescribed the mode in which the officers of the militia should be appointed, no alteration can be made therein, "and expresses a solicitude that the wisdom of the States may be manifested by inducing individuals, who had acquired military skill in our Revolutionary contest, to accept of these militia appointments, and thus render their dear bought knowledge useful to the nation."

The army of which General Knox speaks, in this report, is an army to be formed by "requisitions" on the States; to be employed only in the exigence of the Constitution, and to be commanded by officers appointed by the State authorities. It is clear, therefore, that he is speaking not of a regular, but of a militia army.

Let this report, sir, be examined from beginning to end, and every sentence criticised, and ingenuity may still be defied to point out a single clause, which, by fair construction, can be made to support the idea, that General Knox intended a draught from the militia into the ranks of the regular Army, under the authority of the General Government. I am indebted to an intelligent gentleman for an idea, which very much corroborates my construction of the report.—General Knox proposes, with a view to maintain defence, a classification of seamen somewhat similar to that of militia. But, to carry this into operation, he declares it requisite that "efficient regulations should be established in the respective States to register seamen, and to render those of a certain age amenable to the public for personal service, if demanded within a given period." Now, sir, why was it necessary to call in the aid of State laws to impose this obligation on the seamen of the United States? It must be because the Constitution of the United States had not conferred on the General Government a right to compel their services; yet that Constitution had given as unlimited a power to provide and maintain a navy, as it had to raise and support an army. Could General Knox, while admitting that the General Government had no compulsory power, in the one case, be supposed to contend for it in the other. Sir, I will trouble the House no further. I trust I have proved to the satisfaction of every reflecting mind, that the documents so confidently produced afford no countenance to the doctrines they were meant to uphold. Whatever other names may be brought forward to sanction the doctrine of conscription, that of the great founder of our liberties cannot be pressed into the detestable service.

The previous question having been required by Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, was then taken, and decided as follows: For the previous question 87, against it 63.

The main question on the passage of the bill was then taken, and decided in the affirmative: For the bill 84, against it 72, as follows:

THURSDAY, December 15.

On motion of Mr. GHOLSON, the petition of Amey Dardin, presented on the 27th December, 1804, was referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. YANCEY reported a bill for the relief of James Doyle, which was read twice, and committed.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, asking a conference on the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and by amending the act laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors." Whereupon,

13th Con. 3d Sess.—30

Resolved, That this House do insist on their disagreement to the said amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. EPPES, Mr. FISK of New York, and Mr. GHOLSON, be the managers at the said conference on the part of this House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by duties on sales at auction; on the postage of letters; on licenses to retail wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise," with amendments; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

DUTIES ON MANUFACTURES.

The House, on motion of Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, by laying duties on various goods, wares, and merchandise, manufactured within the United States."

[This bill proposes to lay on all manufactures the duties specified in the following extract from the bill:]

On pig iron, per ton, one dollar.

On castings of iron, per ton, one dollar and fifty cents.

On bar iron, per ton, one dollar.

On rolled or slit iron, per ton, one dollar.

On cut nails, brads, and sprigs, made wholly or in part by machinery, per pound, one cent.

On candles of spermaceti or white wax, per pound, ten cents.

On mould candles of tallow, or of wax, or other than white, or in part of each, per pound, three cents.

On dipped candles of tallow, or of wax, other than white, or in part of each, per pound, one cent.

On hats, caps of leather or fur, bonnets, except made entirely from wool, silk, cotton, or linen, or in part from each, or which, if made from other materials, shall not exceed in value one dollar and fifty cents, eight per centum ad valorem.

On paper, five per centum ad valorem.

On playing cards, fifty per centum ad valorem.

On saddles and bridles, six per centum ad valorem.

On boots and hootees, exceeding five dollars per pair in value, five per centum ad valorem.

On beer, ale, and porter, six per centum ad valorem.

On tobacco, cigars, and snuff, twenty per centum ad valorem.

On leather, including therein all hides and skins, whether tanned, tawed, dressed, or otherwise made, on the original manufacture thereof, ten per centum ad valorem.

Mr. EPPES assigned, at some length, the reasons why the committee had, on these manufactures, departed occasionally from the instructions of the House, and generally preferred an ad valorem to a specific duty; the principal of which was, the great variety in quality and denomination of these articles, which, while it would make specific duties vexatious, would render them liable to continual evasions. All the articles proposed to be dutied, he further said, pay a much higher duty when imported, and, whilst the last section of this bill limited the operation of the tax to the continuance of the double duties now imposed by law, no article had been selected for taxation which it was believed the United States could not manufacture in abundance for their consumption. In the present situation of the country, conceiving it unnecessary to say anything on the necessity of imposing additional taxes, he waived any remarks on that head.

Mr. BAYLIES, of Massachusetts, moved to strike out the following words in the above enumeration: "Cut nails, brads, and sprigs, made wholly or in part by machinery, one cent per pound."

Mr. B. supported this motion by a variety of arguments, to show the probable oppressive effects of this duty on the manufacture in question, particularly in the part of the country which he represented, where nails are manufactured entirely from imported iron. This description of manufacture, he said, already labored under great disadvantage, arising from the expense of erecting the necessary machinery, from the high premium paid to inventors for the use of their patent right, and from the increase of the cost of transportation and diminution of consumption occasioned by the war, &c. So high a duty would have the effect, he feared, of converting the manufacture by machinery to the manufacture by hand, to the prejudice of the morals and agriculture of the country. He said, he could not see why a discrimination was made between nails manufactured by the aid of machinery, and those made by hand. Mr. B. added, that this tax was not one of those recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. EPPES, in reply to one of Mr. B.'s suggestions, said, that the reason why wrought nails were exempted from taxation, was, that there was no other way in which nails made for domestic use, for shoeing horses, or such occasional purposes, could be exempted from taxation. No tax on nails, made by the hand, could be made to produce anything to the revenue without involving great oppression. It was, besides, however, not reasonable or equitable that a man who makes nails by a laborious operation by hand, should be placed on a level with him who cuts off a peck of nails at a single stroke or movement of a machine.

The motion of Mr. BAYLIES was negatived—ayes only 39.

This amendment having failed—

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, moved to amend this clause so as to reduce the tax on nails from one cent to half a cent per pound, which he supported by a variety of observations.

The motion was opposed by Mr. FISK of Vermont, Mr. EPPES, and Mr. KILBOURN; and supported by Mr. WM. REED; and was negatived—ayes 34.

Various modifications of this clause were proposed, one only of which succeeded, viz: to insert, "or rolled," after the word "cut."

On motion of Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, the word "manufactured," was added to the word

"tobacco," so as to define more clearly the nature of that tax.

Mr. FORNEY, of North Carolina, moved to amend the clause respecting pig iron, so as to reduce the duty from one dollar to fifty cents per ton.—Negatived.

Mr. F. then moved to strike out the words "castings of iron per ton, one dollar and fifty cents," and insert in lieu thereof, "hollow ware per ton one dollar, or open sand castings fifty cents per ton;" which motion he supported on the alleged inequality of value of the articles thus proposed to be taxed alike. The motion was negatived.

Mr. WHEATON moved to amend the clause for taxing "hats," by inserting, among the exceptions, such as are made of "straw;" in support of which motion he made a number of ingenious and pertinent remarks, arising from the domestic nature of this manufacture, principally carried on by young females in the Eastern States.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, in an equally good-humored manner, objected to the motion; deeming the elegant bonnets which adorn our ladies' heads, and their perpetually changing fashions, as fit subjects of taxation.

Mr. FISK, of New York, observed, that it was far from the Financial Committee's intention to include this branch of manufacture; and the motion of Mr. WHEATON was agreed to by a great majority.

Mr. BIGELOW, of Massachusetts, supported by his colleague, (Mr. BRIGHAM,) moved to strike out the tax on leather altogether. Negatived—ayes 42.

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, moved to amend the clause relating to the tax on hats, by striking out "one dollar and fifty cents," and inserting in lieu thereof, "two dollars."—Agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the above extract, by striking out all the proposed taxes, except those on pig iron, castings, bar, and rolled, and slit iron, playing cards, beer, ale and porter, and tobacco, cigars, and snuff; and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

On flour, fifty cents per barrel.

On corn, five cents per bushel.

On rye, five cents per bushel.

On cotton, two cents per pound.

On hemp, two cents per pound.

On sugar, two cents per pound.

On rice, one cent per pound.

On tobacco, one cent per pound.

On copper and leaden ore, and coal of mines, ten per centum ad valorem.

On steam engines, if employed in factories, fifty dollars; if employed in propelling boats, one hundred dollars; and when an exclusive privilege shall be enjoyed by the person or persons chargeable therewith, two hundred dollars.

On offices, created by authority of the United States, whose emolument, by salary or perquisites, shall annually exceed fifteen hundred dollars, and not exceed five thousand, one per centum; and on those which exceed five thousand dollars, five per centum on such excess, except those offices whose emoluments are prohibited from diminution by the Constitution: Pro- vided, That so much of each of the foregoing products, as shall be consumed by the owner, shall be exempted from taxation.

This motion Mr. WILSON supported by a train of reasoning on this basis: that the freeholders, who form the body of those who are represented on this floor, ought to pay a tax, if not higher, at least in some degree proportioned to the tax now proposed to be levied on the poor and industrious mechanics of the country. He made use of a number of arguments to show that the taxes he proposed were equitable in themselves, and more reasonable than those proposed by his motion to be exempted from taxation; and particularly the article of spermaceti candles, and some others, which will have an exclusively sectional operation. In this exposition he went much into detail.

The question on this motion was taken without debate, and decided in the negative—ayes only thirteen.

Mr. FISK, of New York, moved to amend the bill so as to exempt from the operation of the tax, all such castings as the Government may now have contracted for to be delivered at stipulated prices. This motion was opposed by Mr. EPES, and negatived by a decided majority.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, moved to strike out the article of "dipped candles;" which motion was supported by Mr. EPES, and decided in the affirmative by a large majority.

Mr. OAKLEY then moved to except from taxation altogether all mould candles of tallow.—Negatived by a large majority.

Mr. JOHN REED, of Massachusetts, moved to strike out "spermaceti" candles; and argued at some length in support of his motion, on the ground of the almost exclusive operation of this tax on the Island of Nantucket and town of New Bedford, &c., and therein diminished ability to pay; as, also, on the ground of its tendency to depress the whale fisheries.

The question on the motion being taken without debate, was decided in the affirmative, as follows: For the motion 54, against it 50.

Mr. UDREE, of Pennsylvania, moved to amend the clause for taxing iron castings, by adding thereto the following proviso:

"Provided, That all castings made use of in furnaces and forges, shall be exempted from paying the duty thereon."

The motion was opposed by Mr. EPES, and negatived by a very large majority.

Mr. PRITIN, of Connecticut, moved to reduce the proposed tax on leather from ten to five per cent. ad valorem.

This motion, having been opposed by Mr. EPES, was negatived.

Mr. PRITIN, considering, as he said, the tax on iron as out of all proportion, and impolitic in the mode of imposition, moved to strike out the proposed tax on pig iron, to try the principle of reducing the tax on iron manufactures.

In the course of his observations, Mr. P. called the attention of the Committee to objects of taxation more eligible than those selected by the Committee of Ways and Means, totally omitted in this bill, viz: manufactures of gold and silver, jewelry, glass wares, umbrellas, &c., and oil-mills. Mr. P.'s motion was negatived—ayes 32.

Mr. BAYLIES moved to strike out five per centum, the proposed tax on paper, and insert three in lieu thereof. This motion was supported by Mr. EPES, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. BRADBURY, of Massachusetts, then moved to except from the clause for taxing paper, such paper as is used for printing newspapers. He said it had ever been the policy of free Governments to encourage the diffusion of information, which this tax would have a tendency to check.

Mr. EPES opposed this motion, not from any disposition to suppress newspapers, because he did not believe it would have this effect; but because he believed the proprietor of a newspaper who, by his business, made his four or five thousand dollars a year, was as fit a subject for taxation as the manufacturers, many of whom derived less profit from their business.

The motion was negatived by a large majority. The House proceeded in further discussion and amendment of the bill. And, about four o'clock, the Committee rose and reported their proceedings to the House, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, December 16.

Mr. McKEE of Kentucky, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill giving further time for the location of certain confirmed claims to lands in the district of Vincennes. Twice read and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill for laying additional duties on sales at auction, postage, and retailers' licenses, were taken up, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

DUTIES ON MANUFACTURES.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill to impose duties on certain goods, wares, and merchandise.

On concurring in the amendment to exempt spermaceti candles from the proposed tax of ten cents per pound, there were, for the motion 63, against it 50.

On the question of concurring in exempting dipped candles from taxation, there were 83 votes in the affirmative.

All the other amendments noted in the proceedings of yesterday were agreed to without a division.

The other amendments made to the details of the bill having been agreed to—

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, moved to place visiting cards in the same clause of taxation as playing cards; which motion was agreed to by the following vote: For the motion 63, against it 29.

Mr. BAYLIES, of Massachusetts, renewed the motion he yesterday made to amend this bill, by striking out the clause for imposing a tax of one cent per pound on the manufacture of nails.

After some debate, this motion was negatived, by yeas and nays—for the motion 39, against it 106, as follows:

Mr. KILBOURN, of Ohio, then moved an amendment, the object of which was to tax candles of spermaceti, at the rate of three cents per pound; which motion prevailed, by the following vote: For the motion 74, against it 51.

Mr. WHEATON, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the bill by adding, after the clause for taxing cut nails, &c., the following words—"when sold." This motion was negatived.

Mr. SHIPHERD, of New York, moved to amend the bill so as to confine the proposed tax on paper to writing and letter paper; under the idea that those qualities of paper could best afford to pay a tax, and from a desire to exempt from taxation all printing paper, and such paper as is used in schools, and in common farmers and mechanics' books, &c.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, remarked, that the gentleman had unfortunately selected for taxation the two qualities of paper which could least bear it. He was himself opposed to any discrimination in the tax.

Mr. SHIPHERD's motion was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, renewed his call upon the attention of the House to what he deemed the impolicy of the tax on pig iron. He dwelt upon the inexpediency of taxing the raw material of manufactures; and added, that there was not on this article, as on others, any duty on its importation, &c. It was imported, if at all, duty free.

The question on this motion was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays. For the motion 48, against it 97, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Cibley, Cooper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Ely, Grosvenor, Hale, Howell, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, Kershaw, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lovett, Moseley, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Piper, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sheffield, Sherwood, Shipherd, Smith of New York, Stockton, Stuart, Sturges, Tannehill, Thompson, Udree, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Wheaton, Wilcox, and Wilson of Massachusetts.

Mr. FORNEY, of North Carolina, then moved to strike out the words "castings of iron, per ton, one dollar and fifty cents;" and to insert in lieu thereof "Hollow ware, one dollar per ton; all other castings seventy-five cents per ton;" which motion was negatived.

Mr. RUGGLES, of Massachusetts, made a motion to reduce the tax on candles of white wax from ten cents per pound to three cents per pound; which motion was negatived.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, then moved to reduce the duty on nails, sprigs, and brads, from one cent per pound to half a cent per pound; which motion was negatived.

Mr. PICKENS moved to amend the bill in the first section, and ninth line, by inserting the word "hollow," before the word castings;" and, after the word "cents," insert these words: "on all other kind of castings of iron, one dollar," which motion was determined in the negative.

Mr. BRADBURY, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the clause taxing paper, by inserting thereafter the words, "except such as shall be used in printing of bibles, testaments, and common school books;" which motion was negatived.

And the bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow; and on motion, the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, December 17.

The engrossed bill, "giving further time to locate certain claims to lands confirmed by an act of Congress, entitled "An act confirming certain claims to lands in the district of Vincennes," was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill for laying additional duties on distillation, made a report. The report recommends that the Senate recede from their determination to strike out the section which allows distilleries to sell liquor in any quantity not less than one gallon, and that the House agree to certain amendments to the details of the bill.

A message having been received from the Senate, announcing their agreement to the said report, the House also agreed to concur in the same.

The House spent some time in Committee of the Whole, on the bill for laying a direct tax on the United States; but, before making much progress, the Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. EPPES, from the committee of conference on the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill for laying duties on postage, sales at auction, and retailers' licenses, made a report, recommending an agreement to all the amendments of the Senate except one; which report was concurred in.

TAX BILLS.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, on horses kept exclusively for the saddle or the carriage, and on gold and silver watches; and the amendments made to the same in Committee of the Whole were read, and concurred in by the House.

[The following are the taxes included in this bill. On all household furniture, kept for use, the value of which, in any one family, with the exception of beds, bedding, kitchen furniture, and articles made in the family from domestic materials, shall exceed two hundred dollars in value a tax to be laid according to the following scale

Several unsuccessful attempts were made to amend the bill; amongst which was one by Mr. GASTON, to strike out so much of the bill as includes the tax on household furniture; which was decided by yeas and nays—For the motion 52, against it 99, as follows:

Mr. LAW, of Connecticut, spoke as follows.

Mr. Speaker, as I have not hitherto retarded the despatch of the public business, by consuming the time of the House in debate, I trust I shall be indulged, while I make a few remarks in justification of the vote I intend to give, on the bill now under consideration. This bill proposes to lay a tax on the manufacture of iron, leather, candles, paper, and other articles which are indispensably necessary, for the people generally, and will be sensibly felt by the poorer classes of community. The bill grows out of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, accepted by the House, and forms a branch of an extensive system of taxation, which will probably continue for years; and as my opposition arises from a conviction that the objects to which the money is to be applied will not warrant the levy, my remarks will go to the system generally, as well as to this particular bill.

The object is to continue the war in which we are engaged; and as an inducement to us, to unite in the measures proposed, many considerations, are urged. Little is of late said of the justice of the war, or the principles on which it was declared; indeed, this would be now idle, if not indecorous, inasmuch as the Administration themselves have relinquished and abandoned every principle on which the war was declared. And instead of fighting to gain, or secure any rights, the question now seems to be, how much we shall give up, to regain that peace we rashly threw away.

We are now called upon to unite in granting the means necessary to prosecute the war; because it is said its character is changed, it has now become a defensive war;—that as we are engaged in it, we must prosecute it with union, firmness, and vigor, or submit to terms which the nation ought not to brook; and that the credit of the nation will be irretrievably lost, unless speedily revived by making suitable and ample provision by taxes. And for these reasons we are required to unite, and this union is to be evidenced by our willingness to grant all the means the Administration demand in men and money. Let us, sir, examine these grounds, and calmly inquire, whether they impose any obligation, or furnish any new claim on those who, from the beginning, have been opposed to the war, among which number I have the consolation to be ranked.

That this nation is in a deplorable condition cannot be denied; but that the character of the war is changed I do deny. It is true, that the effects and operation of the war on this people have been different from what was expected or anticipated by its advocates; but not diverse from those predicted by its opposers. Instead of possessing the British provinces on the North and East in rapid succession, we daily tremble even here, and on the whole seacoast, watching the movements of the hostile fleets, which ride undisturbed in every bay and inlet bordering along the Atlantic; scarcely a spot is guarded against their encroachment; they assail us, put the country in commotion, burn, ravage, and destroy the dwellings of our citizens, and retire when they please. Still the character of the war is not changed; everything else has changed, except the Administration and the character of the war, and this will remain the same, so long as they continue to guide and direct the affairs of this nation. Some of the causes which engendered and produced the war had been nurtured and cherished for years; nor was the act, in my opinion, so much the result of wise policy and sound judgment, as the effect of passion. Our grand object had been for years to cripple and injure Great Britain, then struggling for the liberties of the European world, as it is now proved and confessed. Hence, that long course of griping policy, which, under the pretence of regulating commerce, had been adopted in deadly succession, in unison with the views of the now fallen tyrant, and which was vainly believed would soon operate the destruction of that kingdom; the effects of which was only to impoverish ourselves, blast our prosperity, and check the vigor and enterprise of this once happy and active people; and which system was persevered in, until it brought down this nation from the proud eminence it once held, to abject poverty and ruin. Our trade was destroyed, our sailors dispersed and banished like our commerce, under the fostering care of the Government. Our stores and warehouses, which once teemed with merchandise of all climes, became vacant and solitary; our wharves and quays were deserted, or lined with empty and mouldering hulks; the hum of business which once enlivened our cities, changed to groans of poverty; industry, which once invigorated and supported thousands, driven for want of employment to idleness and beggary. And, to cap the climax of our calamities, at last came the declaration of war, and converted thousands, who, in better times, might have been employed in productive labor, into drones, consuming the substance of the nation, in the shape of soldiers, contractors, tax-gatherers, and sharpers, in the employment of the Administration, in endless varieties.

We, sir, struck the first blow, as it were, in the dark, against the defenceless provinces of Canada; they resisted and repelled our attacks; disgrace and mortification ensued. Our Administration were disappointed; they awoke from their delirium, and behold! the author and contriver of the evils we have suffered, and are suffering, retires from the nations of the earth—his kingdom taken from him. Our enemy increased in strength, having finished his work on the continent of Europe, is at liberty to succor his provinces, and send his ships on our coast, not in the small number of six or seven, which was once stated on this floor to be the extent he could maintain at any one time on our Atlantic frontier, but in fleets powerful and numerous; and powerful and numerous must they be to drive our gallant navy from the ocean, compel them to retire into rivers, or seek refuge under fortifications, to avoid the grasp of the enemy.

Sir, the great body of the people in this country were never heartily disposed to engage in this controversy. We perceive no national enthusiasm on the subject of the war; this appears pretty clear from the difficulty in recruiting the army, even with the artificial stimulus of great bounties and high wages, which have been held out to them. They saw nothing at the time of the declaration, different from what had existed for years; injuries they knew this country had experienced from Great Britain, but they were, and ever had been considered, as growing out of the peculiar relation the countries stood in to each other, and which required a remedy by negotiation rather than by force—an opinion now entertained by the present Administration. But the people never were disposed to contend for abstract principles, and fight for rights, which required subtlety to define and sophistry to support. Many indeed believed, as they had been told, that a halcyon period would follow after a very short struggle. They acquiesced, and some justified the war—others deploring the mad career which the Administration were pursuing, and the certain ruin to which their measures would lead, strove to arrest the downward course; they were stigmatized as traitors and enemies to the country, and even threatened with confiscation and hemp, because they opposed the war; their apprehensions are now realized, and their prediction verified.

This war, sir, was invited at a time when it was altogether unwise and unnecessary to declare it; no preparations had been previously made to meet the crisis, and we all remember with what hard and painful struggles it was produced; and Great Britain at that time had no wish to engage in the contest. I will not say that this disposition, on their part, proceeded from any regard to this country, or respect for our rights, which our policy had inspired, but because they had other engagements on hand, which required their whole energies and resources; it was to rescue the world from the dominion of a bloody despot. And I confess I was not a little surprised to notice in a late literary communication, from one who may be presumed to have some knowledge of the views, and perhaps some influence in the Cabinet, an insinuation that Great Britain, “suddenly withdrawn from a great war, full armed and full handed, taking advantage of this nation, whom they had recently forced into war unarmed and unprepared, to indulge themselves in acts of barbarism which do not belong to a civilized age;” representing, with no little art, that Great Britain first declared war against this country, at a moment unexpected, and solely for the purpose of indulging a fiend-like disposition! Now, sir, the world knows we first declared this war, and whatever consequences may flow from it, the blood will be required at our hands. We have none to reproach for the miseries we are now suffering but ourselves—our own rash folly produced them. We did expect Great Britain would be occupied for years in the war with France, as was suggested in the Message at the opening of the present session; we are disappointed—that struggle is at an end; we have lost the aid we expected, and we are now left with war, distress, and misery, while most other nations are reposing in the calm delights of peace. And so indignant is the enemy we have chosen, at the time and manner in which the war was declared, and so flushed and willing is that nation to continue the conflict in which we are engaged, that, although we have in the very ashes of humility and repentance, given up every principle, real or pretended, for which war was declared, we are now willing to make peace without securing anything but national poverty and ridicule. Yet Great Britain, not pitying, but mocking at our calamities, refuses to treat of peace, but on the most humiliating conditions.

Sir, what are our hopes by continuing the war? The Administration have had, so far as we could grant, all the means, in men and money, which their ambition and prodigality demanded; and, under the most auspicious circumstances, they have now wasted two years and a half, and what have they accomplished? Have they secured "Free Trade and Sailors' Rights," this darling national amulet? Both have been, on mature consideration, deliberately abandoned. Have they made any progress in the conquest of the Canadas? So far from progressing in this great work, that for a long time after the declaration of war no rays of that glory, which at one time seemed almost to intoxicate some gentlemen, darted in the Northern sky. And except the instances of Perry, Macdonough, and a few others, over whose heads the Aurora Borealis has shone resplendent, we have gained nothing; and our prospects in that quarter now are as gloomy and cheerless as the sterile regions we cover. We have lost much territory; our armies have been wasted; our money is exhausted, and our credit gone. If, after all this, we persevere in the original scheme of conquering the Canadas, thereby provoking the enemy to commit devastation and waste on the seaboard, how can it be said the character of the war is changed? It is still marked with its original hideous and deformed features.

And, sir, it is owing in no small degree to the weakness and incompetency of the Administration to execute their own projects, that the progress of the enemy has not been marked with more extended ruin; recollect the proclamation of the Governor of Canada, when he took ample vengeance on the wretched borderers, on Lake Erie, the last year; also the correspondence between Mr. Monroe and Admiral Cochrane in the months of August and September last, in which the Admiral says:

"Having been called upon by the Governor of the Canadas, to aid him in carrying into effect measures of retaliation against the inhabitants of the United States, for the wanton destruction committed by their army in Upper Canada, it has become imperiously my duty, conformably with the nature of the Governor General's application, to issue to the naval force under my command an order to destroy and lay waste such towns and districts upon the coast as may be found assailable."

And in reply to Mr. Monroe's argumentative answer, complaining of the above plan of desolating warfare, the Admiral says:

"As I have no authority from my Government to enter upon any kind of discussion relative to the points contained in your letter, I have only to regret that there does not appear to be any hope that I shall be authorized to recall my general order; which has been further sanctioned by a subsequent request from Lieutenant General Sir George Prevost."

This order, sir, has been partially, but too fatally executed already. But should we grant the money required by this and other bills, and, in conformity with the plan of the Secretary of War, raise 100,000 men, and actually invade Canada the ensuing campaign, have we not reason to fear that, before the next 24th of August, many of our beautiful and most flourishing cities, towns, and villages, on the seacoast, will present the same melancholy spectacle which the capital of the nation now exhibits? And yet we are called on to furnish money to prosecute this war of conquest, regardless of all consequences. The passions which gave birth to the war have not yet subsided, nor will they be suffered to expire so long as the present Administration continue in power.

The character of the war is not changed, nor ought we to be deceived, and imagine it is altered essentially from an offensive to a defensive war; or believe that the people have become more in love with it, because thousands have volunteered without request, on well-founded hopes of reward from the General Government, to defend their soil and their homes. The Administration have one object in view, and the brave yeomanry of our country are actuated by totally different motives. The first are regardless of the duty of protection, and are eager for conquest and aggrandizement; the latter are influenced by the strong principle of self-defence. Men who detest the war, its authors, and the vain objects of ambition they are pursuing, are constrained to defend themselves against those dangers which Government have invited, but against which they have provided no protection. The States, feeling themselves abandoned by the General Government, have defended themselves; and while fighting for defence of their soil, they generally have been, and will be, meritorious, for they are animated in a just cause, which must be triumphant. But the Administration having started in this war upon wrong principles, and having pursued a course as unwise as it is difficult, have failed in all their plans—military, financial, and diplomatic. Indeed, such is the baneful influence which hangs about them, that, where they personally direct and control, even patriotism, and the stronger principles of self-defence, is benumbed and withered by their touch. Witness the disgraceful scene which took place where we now are, on the 24th of August last! when our troops were led to battle in one of the most honorable causes which could possibly occur; when everything dear and valuable, everything which could animate the breast or nerve the arm, should have prompted them to valorous resistance—their families, houses—the very ark and sanctuary of the nation was the prize of the conflict; yet under such leaders our troops retired before the enemy; they fled after the example of the Captain General and his sympathetic Secretaries, the guardians of this consecrated spot, and surrendered the pride of the nation to the spoilers, to be stamped with indelible disgrace in characters of vandalism! On that fatal day our mighty chieftains seemed to possess no power or energy, except to vie with the victorious vandals in destroying the costly works of taste and art; and skilful rivals they proved themselves to be, as the sad monuments of their destruction now within our view do testify. In most other cases, where the States have depended on themselves, and confided in the justice of their cause, and directed their energies merely to defend their soil, they have resisted manfully, and generally with success. This I know has been the fact in the State I have the honor to represent; there, although they were opposed to the war, neither believing in its justice, expediency, or policy, yet they are determined to defend and protect the soil which gave them birth, and is hallowed by the sepulchres of their fathers; but from this noble determination the Administration can derive no aid in their ulterior views.

It is further urged, as a reason why we should grant money to prosecute the war, that it appears by the communications containing the instructions and correspondence with our commissioners, that the terms proposed by Great Britain are such as cannot be accepted, consistent with the honor and dignity of this nation, and therefore we ought to unite in a vigorous prosecution of the war. I am willing to admit the terms, as contained in the Message of October last, taken in the extent they seem to imply, without any modification or qualification, are such as we ought not to accept. But, I am happy to say, the correspondence contained in the Message of the first of the present month, looks much more favorable, and the aspect is much more pacific now than was at first supposed. Yet suppose the terms of peace are as hard and unreasonable as they at first appeared, it would not necessarily follow that we must unite in carrying on our offensive war against the Canadas, and thereby add tenfold to the miseries and distresses of the country. It is by no means certain that, during the time the present Administration remain in power, with their present views of territorial aggrandizement, we shall be able to obtain better terms. Great Britain is now powerful and flourishing; war is the habit of that nation; they are flushed with their recent successes, and, by commanding the trade of the world, they possess great resources—men, and munitions of war—they may continue the war for years, without greatly impairing their strength, while we are daily wasting our vigor; being locked up within ourselves, all our resources must be derived from internal impositions. This bill is to reach the hard earnings of the mechanic; another on your table is to spread over the farming interest, with supplements adapted to the pockets of all. Further, sir, the war is at a distance from them, and conquering the provinces will not conquer that nation; but we have unwisely brought the war within our own bosom—they can retire and recruit when they please, we cannot—and a continuance of the contest will be certain destruction to us, even if we succeed in the conquest of Canada. It is also uncertain what the conditions of peace may eventually be; this may depend on our success, and, judging of the past, our future prospects are not very flattering. It may be here asked what we shall do; we are in a sad dilemma, and must prosecute the war, or submit to degrading terms? My answer is, that notwithstanding our present prospects are dark and gloomy, yet I believe it is in the power of the Administration to obtain terms, which would be for the honor and interest of both nations to accept; and I indulge this opinion for the following reasons: I believe Great Britain probably would, under a change of circumstances, negotiate with us on principles of reciprocity. I say it is probable she would, because it appears by the documents before us that our Administration, while Bonaparte was on his throne, and when it was supposed we were strong and Great Britain weak, were as haughty and arrogant in their demands as Great Britain is now, when Bonaparte is confined at Elba, and when they believe themselves strong and us weak; yet our Administration did descend from the high and lofty pretensions they once set up, to a tone of humility and condescension, which not long since would have been considered no less than a sacrifice of national pride, honor, and independence. This appears from a variety of documents. I will advert to a few extracts only.

In the Message of the President, of November 4th, 1812, after stating the progress of the war, and the proud attitude the United States had assumed by the declaration, he says:

“To have shrunk, under such circumstances, from manly resistance, would have struck us from the high rank where the victories of our fathers had placed us, and have betrayed the magnificent legacy which we held in trust for future generations; it would have acknowledged that on the element which forms three-fourths of the globe we inhabit, and where all independent nations have equal and common rights, the American people were not an independent people, but vassals and colonists.”

In the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, to whom the above Message was referred, they say—

“To appeal to arms, in defence of a right, and to lay them down without securing it, or a satisfactory evidence of a good disposition in the opposite party to secure it, would be considered in no other light than a relinquishment of it; to attempt to negotiate afterwards for the security of our right, in expectation that any of the arguments which have been urged before the declaration of war and been rejected, would have more weight after that experiment had been made in vain, would be an act of folly, which would not fail to expose us to the scorn and derision of the British nation and the world.”

Again, in the same report—

“War having been declared, and the case of impressment being necessarily included as one of the most important causes, it is evident that it must be provided for in the pacification; the omission of it in a treaty of peace would not leave it on its former ground; it would, in effect, be an absolute relinquishment—an idea at which the feelings of every American must revolt.”

In the instructions to our Ministers, in the letter of the 15th April, 1813, Mr. Monroe says—

“You are authorized to conclude a peace, in case

H. OF R.

you obtain a satisfactory stipulation against impressment; one which will secure, under the flag, protection to the crew. If this encroachment is not provided against, the United States have appealed to arms in vain. If your efforts to accomplish it should fail, all further negotiations will cease, and you will return home without delay. It is also important to obtain a definition of neutral rights, especially of blockade; but this is not to be made an indispensable condition of peace."

In the letter of January 23, 1814—

"On impressment, as to the right of the United States to be exempted from it, I have nothing to add. The sentiments of the President have undergone no change on this important subject. This degrading practice must cease. Our flag must protect the crew, or the United States cannot consider themselves an independent nation." And in the same letter, referring to former instructions, he says: "The principal object of this review has been to show that the sentiments of the President are the same in every instance; and the reasons for maintaining them have become more evident and strong since the date of those instructions."

In the letter of 25th June, 1814, he says:

"We think it probable that the late events in France may have had a tendency to increase the pretensions of the British Government." And again: "No reliance was placed on the good offices of France in bringing the war with Great Britain to a satisfactory conclusion." And in the same letter he adds: "On full consideration it has been decided, that in case no stipulation can be obtained from the British Government at this moment, when its pretensions may have been much heightened by recent events, and the state of Europe most favorable to them, either relinquishing the claim to impress from American vessels, or discontinuing the practice, even in consideration of the proposed exclusion from them of British seamen, you may concur in an article stipulating that the subject of impressment, together with that of commerce between the two countries, be referred to a separate negotiation."

In a letter of June 27, 1814, he says—

"On mature consideration it has been decided, that under all the circumstances above alluded to, incident to a prosecution of the war, you may omit any stipulation on the subject of impressment, if found indispensably necessary to terminate it."

Sir, the only apology for this magnanimous change in the sentiments of the Administration, was a change of circumstances; this apology, I believe, would have been satisfactory to the nation, if peace had followed; and many of the most ardent friends of the war would have acquiesced, and have preferred to witness the Administration condemn their own logic, and commit "an act of folly, which could not fail to expose them to the scorn and derision of the British nation and the world," rather than continue in this mad and headlong course.

Now, I believe Great Britain would treat with us fairly, if they had a similar apology—a change of circumstances; and this change, which would lead to so desirable an event, is in the power of the Administration to produce. And here I must mention certain things, not as much on account of their novelty as their importance in bringing about this great desideratum. Let the Administration recall the troops from Canada, or rather the borders of Canada, and abandon the project of conquering those provinces; and it might not be an unwise preparatory step for them to recall such of the Ministers as are well known to possess sentiments and opinions better calculated to excite disgust and repulsion, rather than to conciliate a pacific disposition in the enemy, and if need be, appoint others in their stead, better qualified to reconcile the jarring interests of the countries. But, above all, it would be desirable to have the Cabinet formed of men who prefer the peace and prosperity of the nation to personal aggrandizement. This, I am sensible, might wound the pride, and perhaps defeat the ambitious views of some high in office, but if they possess as much patriotism and love of country as they profess, they cannot hesitate to make the sacrifice for the good of the country. This being done, Great Britain may then say, in the language of the instructions, they are enabled to give to these circumstances all the weight to which they are entitled, and on full consideration, agree to waive their arrogant demands, and treat on terms acceptable to both nations.

This experiment has not yet been tried. The Administration have been trying experiments for years, but this appears to me the only one which can effect the great object we so much desire. The course of the Administration has, hitherto, been rather to justify their own conduct, than honestly and sincerely to seek for peace. Their policy has been marked with duplicity and cunning, and they have lost confidence at home and abroad. Their whole system must be abandoned before we can hope for better times. A change of measures can only follow a change of men. I say, then, the experiment has not been fairly tried. I do not yet despair of peace, but until every attempt is made, and all reasonable hopes of peace are absolutely destroyed, I shall neither vote for men or money to prosecute this war; nor can I be considered hostile to the best interest of the country, by withholding my aid from this bill.

As to our duty to vote for the money bills on the ground that the national credit is sinking, and will be irretrievably lost unless speedily revived by making suitable and ample provision by taxes. It certainly is, sir, the duty of those who are the guardians of the public interest, and hold the purse-strings of the nation, to preserve its credit. This does not depend so much on making profuse grants of money, as by husbanding the resources of the nation and limiting its expenditures within its means. Neither of these have been attended to by those who have had the control for years past. They have systematically, and of set design, dried up the sources of national wealth, and by a long course of unwise policy conducted this nation to beggary and ruin. The millions which have been raised at immense sacrifice have been dissipated with prodigality, and squandered in this destructive war. Appropriations have been made, taxes laid, and other means provided to cover the enormous estimates which have been deemed necessary to answer the demands of Government, and yet there now remains a deficit of many millions.

Tax Bills.

Under such management the public credit cannot be supported—the ability of the nation cannot sustain it. No prudent and wise steps have been taken to preserve it. The credit of the country was solid and stable when the power came into the hands of those who now hold it, but they have destroyed both public and private credit. Is it, then, reasonable to require of those who have been uniformly opposed to the measures which have reduced the nation to its present degraded and deplorable condition, to unite in adding new and grievous burdens on their suffering constituents when they are satisfied the money will be dissipated, as formerly, and no substantial benefit result? I think not. The majority have the power, and on them must rest the responsibility.

Sir, I should be doing injustice to my constituents—I should betray the trust reposed in me, were I to consent to burden them with the enormous taxes proposed to be applied to the objects intended. I know full well their feelings and opinions on this subject. They have been opposed to this ruinous war from the beginning. They had suffered much before, but more since the declaration of war. They did believe they should receive protection from the General Government. Under this expectation they have yielded obedience to all their lawful requisitions, and have paid their direct and internal taxes with a punctuality and promptness beyond any State in the Union, as the return will show. The amount of taxes paid by them into the Treasury the last year, exceeds the whole amount of their State taxes for five years before the war. In addition to which, in consequence of your ships taking refuge in their waters, (and many of them are not without a jealousy they were ordered there by the Government to draw them into the war,) the people of that State have now for eighteen months been called into actual service, and are still obliged to maintain a large force for the defence of the State, abandoned and neglected by the General Government, and the expense thrown on the State without any reasonable prospect of remuneration. And, sir, permit me to say, while as good citizens they feel disposed to comply with all just and lawful requisitions of the General Government, they did believe, as a consideration for their obedience, you would “provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure to them and their posterity the blessings of liberty.” But they have been disappointed; they perceive no regard to these sacred duties—the great objects of the Constitution. You have not provided for the common defence—at least they are left to defend themselves, or fall a prey to the enemy whom you have invited to their very threshold. They perceive no evidence that you seek to promote the general welfare, and they fear if certain bills become the law of the land they shall be robbed of the bless-sings of liberty. Yet, under all these discouragements they are determined, and, I trust, will defend themselves against the enemy who dare approach their shores—and as evidence of the spirit and determination of my constituents, I cannot, in justice to them, forbear here to mention the attack on the village of Stonington, the last Summer.

When Sir Thomas Hardy appeared before that town with a formidable squadron, consisting of a ship-of-the-line, a frigate, a sloop of war, a bomb ship, and a bomb brig, and came to anchor within dead shot of the town, and gave but a few hours to remove the women and children, declaring in the most peremptory manner that he not only could, but would destroy the place, they refused to abandon their homes. Being freemen, and freeholders, they resisted. Federalists and Democrats rallied side by side, and with the feeble means in their power, they became strong from the justice of their cause, and, after three days' severe conflict, they repulsed the insolent invader, and drove him back to report his disgrace and discomfiture to his master. I mention this exploit because it is considered one of the most brilliant and heroic which has been achieved this war; but as it was performed in defence of that neglected State, and not in the conquest of Canada, I presume you have neither thanks nor medals to bestow on the heroes.

Now, sir, under all these considerations, I cannot feel justified to increase the taxes on my constituents, to be expended for objects which they deem worse than useless, and which, if persisted in, must expose them to greater perils and dangers. They do not believe, with the late Secretary (Campbell) “that the very expenditure of the additional taxes will themselves have increased in the community the ability to discharge them.”

Sir, we have acted with precipitation long enough. It may be wise to stop and consider the consequences which may flow from the measures we are pursuing if persisted in much longer. The people begin to feel their grievances. Overwhelmed with taxes and expenses, their resources cut off—their murmurs and complaints are now mild and plaintive; they will become louder and louder. If the Government perseveres in the course it is pursuing, it may shake the pillars which support the national dome. The pressure has already caused some of them to tremble. If they add to the weight in the manner proposed, it may fall—not like yonder Capitol, for that can be rebuilt.

Mr. LAW was replied to by Mr. EPPES and Mr. WRIGHT; and after considerable discussion of the various amendments proposed to the bill, it was ordered to a third reading.

The engrossed bill “to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on various goods, wares, and merchandise, manufactured within the United States, was read a third time, and passed by the following vote:

MONDAY, December 19.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, "authorizing the payment to the widow of ELBRIDGE GERRY, deceased, late Vice President of the United States, of such salary as would have been payable to him during the residue of the term for which he was elected, had he so long lived; in which they ask the concurrence of this House." They have concurred in certain parts of the amendments proposed by this House to the bill "to authorize the President of the United States to call upon the several States and Territories thereof for their respective quotas of eighty thousand militia, for the defence of the frontiers of the United States against invasion;" and they have disagreed to other parts of the said amendments.

MR. YANCEY, of North Carolina, reported a bill for the relief of William Robinson and others, (citizens of Knox county, Kentucky,) which was twice read and committed.

MR. BURWELL, of Virginia, laid upon the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to report a bill directing the Secretary of War to reserve from the regular troops furnished by the militia of any State, in lieu of their own services, a sufficient number to perform garrison duty within each State.

The House, on motion of MR. EPPES of Virginia, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to provide additional revenue for defraying the expenses of the Government, and for the maintenance of the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States.

[This bill is of great length and minute in its details, proposed amendments to which occupied much time of the House in discussion. The amount of the direct tax is one hundred per cent. on the last year's tax, or six millions of dollars upon the whole United States.]

After the bill had been gone through, the committee rose, and reported to the House the amendments they had made.

PETITION OF W. H. WASHINGTON.

MR. YANCEY made a report on the petition of William H. Washington; which was read; when, MR. Y. reported a bill for the relief of William H. Washington; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next. The report is as follows

That the petitioner owned a small house, situated in Alexandria county, near the western end of the Potomac bridge; that, on the 24th of August last, a quantity of public stores was removed from Greenleaf's Point, by order of Colonel Wadsworth, and deposited in the house for safe keeping: a corporal and five men were stationed at the house to protect them from falling into the possession of the enemy. The command of the stores was given to Lieutenant Baden, who directed the corporal, in case of attack by the enemy, to blow up the stores and retire from the place.

It appears from the affidavit of the corporal, hereto attached, that he apprehended an attack by the enemy, and, under that impression, blew up the stores and destroyed the house. The petitioner claims the value of his house.

Whether the destruction of the house was necessary to prevent the public stores from falling into the hands of the enemy, is a matter of opinion, to be formed by the facts submitted to the House. The committee are of opinion that, inasmuch as the officer to whose care the public stores were committed thought it prudent and proper to destroy the house and stores, to prevent the latter coming to the possession of the enemy, the petitioner should be paid the value of his house. They therefore report by bill.

WASHINGTON COUNTY, District of Columbia.

Be it remembered, that on this third day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, before me, the subscriber, a justice of the peace for the county and district aforesaid, personally appeared Philip Boilia, corporal in the United States' Army, and, being sworn in due form, deposed and said: that, on the 24th August, he was stationed with five privates over a quantity of public stores which had been deposited in a frame house, said to belong to William H. Washington, at the foot of the Potomac bridge, in Alexandria county; that he was ordered to take care of the said stores by Lieutenant Baden, and to blow up the said stores, if the deponent was attacked by the enemy; that, on the 25th August, about three o'clock, P. M., as soon as the storm that day had ceased, the deponent saw a British officer, who came to the draw in the bridge, on the Virginia side, and soon after returned; that a number of British soldiers were, at the same time, at the toll-house on this side of the river; that the draws on the bridge had been raised the night before, and kept up, but were blown down during the storm, and the chains that raised them were broken; that, soon after the officer on the bridge returned, a cannon shot was fired at him, the deponent, from the Point; and this deponent thinking that the enemy intended an attack, and not having the means to prevent the enemy passing, as the draw was broken, blew up the stores with powder, and retired with the men to the hill near the place; that the explosion destroyed the house entirely, there being a quantity of ammunition and powder in the house.

LETTER FROM THE CLERK.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Patrick Magruder, Clerk of the House, partly in explanation, and partly in refutation of the statements of the select committee appointed to take into consideration his former letter respecting the destruction of the public library, and certain papers belonging to his office, during the late incursion of the enemy; which letter was read and referred with the said report to a select committee. The letter is as follows:

OFFICE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U.S.,
December 17, 1814.

SIR: The undersigned, Clerk of the House of Representatives, feels himself bound, from the respect due to the House and to himself, to state the situation in which he was previous to the destruction of his office and the Library of Congress. This is rendered indispensably necessary by the remarks contained in the report of the committee upon his accounts for disbursements of the contingent money of the House of Representatives.

It must be very distinctly recollected by every member of the committee, as well as by every member of the House, that I was laboring under a severe indisposition during the whole of the Fall, and the greater part of the Winter of 1813, and that I was unable to resume the discharge of my official duties until about the first of January, 1814. After the rising of Congress I was twice violently attacked with the same complaint, which assumed a serious appearance, and threatened my life. Under these circumstances, my physicians advised me to visit the Springs, as a measure necessary to restore my health. If the House shall deem it necessary, the certificates of the physicians will be procured and laid before them.

When I left this city I can say, without the fear of contradiction, that the enemy was not in any of the rivers leading to this place, or that their force was sufficient, either in the bay or on the coast, to justify an expectation of an attack on the Seat of Government. I believe that the Heads of the Departments did not, at that time, contemplate that any movement would be made by the enemy threatening the city of Washington. Under these circumstances and facts, the Clerk of the House of Representatives most respectfully asks leave to observe, that he is free from censure, because of his going to the Springs to recover his health, which was worn down by a constant and assiduous attention to his official duties.

With respect to that part of the report of the committee, which charges the Clerk and those in his employ with not using a proper degree of vigilance and precaution for the preservation of the papers appertain-ing to the office of the House and of the Library of Congress, he begs the House to refer to a statement for information upon this subject written by two of his clerks, who are known to be gentlemen of respectability and truth, and laid before the House on the 22d of September, a copy of which he herewith presents, marked No. 1.

The Clerk has further to observe upon this subject, that it will appear, by the certificate of Captain Burch, herewith accompanying, marked No. 2, that two of his clerks, Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Berry, were doing duty in his company of artillery from the 19th of August until after the destruction of the Capitol; that they could not leave the camp without a furlough from the Colonel or General, which was never granted them; that it will appear, by the statement of Captain Bestor, No. 3, that Mr. Burch, another of his clerks, and upon whom he placed much reliance, was marched from the city, and continued under his command until the afternoon of the 21st of August, when he was furloughed by General Smith, as will be seen by his General Order No. 4. Mr. Burch did not get into the city until nightfall of that day. Another of his clerks, Colonel George Magruder, who was the commander of one of the regiments then in the service, marched with his regiment, and continued with it, as was his duty, until after the destruction of the Capitol. There was then only one clerk left, Mr. Frost, who had just before been appointed in the office, and he also would have been taken away with the military, if he had not been over the age prescribed by law for militia service. From these facts it results that, of the clerks in my employ, those in the company of Captain Burch had no power whatever to interfere in the saving of the office and library from destruction; that Mr. Burch could not do anything for their preservation until Monday, the 22d, nor could Colonel Magruder, without deserting his duties in the field.

On the 22d Mr. Burch and Mr. Frost did commence the removal of the office, not in the afternoon, as is stated in the report of the committee, but actually in the forenoon. The means of transportation were limited for three days previous, and on that day the committee have admitted it was almost impossible to procure it at all.

The evidence which the committee have procured from the Departments, of the facility which they found in removing their papers, can have no bearing on the present case, as these Departments began to pack up on the 18th or 19th of the month, and, in fact, removed before the afternoon of the 22d; and, consequently, had all their means of transportation in readiness previous to the time it became so difficult to procure it.

The Clerk begs leave further to observe, that the Heads of Departments, being in the confidence of the Government, had much better means of procuring correct information of the movements of the enemy than the clerks in his office, whose only sources of information were the common reports to be heard in the streets; and it is notorious, that the public mind was in darkness and ignorance upon the subject of the strength and movements of the enemy; that the Heads of Departments gave orders to pack up their papers, as has been observed before, some on the 19th, and some even on the 18th of the month; and that, as many, if not a majority, of their clerks were over the age of forty-five years, they were not compelled to leave the offices. This accounts for their ability to pack up their papers, and, in some cases, actually to remove them,

H. OF R.

Letter from the Clerk of the House.

before it was in the power of my clerks to commence the business.

The Clerk must, therefore, be permitted to say, and he says it with confidence, that those in his employ were not guilty of negligence, or inattention in the preservation of the office, unless, indeed, the committee will prove that they were not in the military service; that they remained during the whole time in the city; and that they took no part or interest in its preservation.

With respect to the Library, he asks the House to refer to the letter of Mr. Frost, marked No. 5. This gentleman acted as under-librarian; the rest of the clerks in my office had no authority or control in that department.

In regard to the contingent expenses of the House, the vouchers for which were destroyed, the undersigned begs leave to state, that the Committee of Accounts have always had the sole control of the disbursements of the funds appropriated for this object, and have sanctioned all the payments which have been made out of it. Being, from the nature of the other duties of his office, unable to attend to this branch of the business, it was confided by the Clerk to Mr. George Magruder, his principal clerk. The amounts drawn at different times from the Treasury have always been so drawn under the direction of the Committee of Accounts, after they had received satisfactory information that the funds already drawn were expended. The Committee of Accounts have always kept a record of their accounts, as well as their chief clerk, and acted as a check upon him, the undersigned has had no further agency in the same, than to affix his signature to them when the forms of office required it. This is not a novel practice, but is, he believes, pursued in regard to the contingent expenses of every office under the Government of any extent; the chief clerks always disbursing the contingent fund, though the principal is responsible for the same. It is not, therefore, so very extraordinary, the undersigned would respectfully suggest, that he was not able to afford to the committee of inquiry a specification of expenditures, of which all the accounts and vouchers were so unfortunately destroyed. He greatly regrets that the chief clerk had kept no duplicate book or memorandum of the accounts paid, which could supply the deficiency of that destroyed, in consequence entirely of his absence on duty in the field of battle. Could the event of that day have been foreseen six hours before it happened, those papers had probably escaped the flames.

It must be obvious to the honorable House that, out of so large a mass of accounts of a miscellaneous character as are paid, in the course of seven months, out of the contingent fund of the House, it would be impossible for the person having paid it, to recollect more than a few items. It is true that the evidence of payment of such accounts may be collected, in a great degree, by the voluntary testimony of those to whom the money was paid, but it is no less true, that this must be a work, not of a day or a week, but of time and research. The undersigned has taken means, by a public advertisement, to accomplish this object, and will not fail to use due diligence in pursuit of it. Meanwhile, he most respectfully suggests that, to accuse him of deficiency and default in his accounts, because the particular items of disbursement are unascertained, could not enter the views of the honorable House or any member of it, because it would be unjust in itself, and would be to add cruelty to that pain which the undersigned has already suffered from the loss sustained in his office.

After these general observations, the undersigned begs the attention of the House to a few remarks on that part of the report which implies an unjust statement as to two of the very few accounts which he or his chief clerk have been able to specify as having been paid. This is due to the House from its Clerk, as well as to his own conscious rectitude, and to a reputation which he hopes no man can justly impeach.

First. As to the account stated by the committee to be overcharged as paid to the messengers and servants of the House, nothing is capable of more satisfactory explanation. These persons were requested to furnish a statement of the amounts they had severally received. They made an error in their statements, which the honorable committee detected, but of which the chief clerk neither participated nor had information until it was reported to the House by the committee, and which neither he nor the persons who made it were afforded an opportunity to amend. That circumstance is more fully explained, and the undersigned hopes in a manner which will be entirely satisfactory to the House, in the accompanying letter from Mr. George Magruder, marked No. 7, and also by a statement of the principal messenger referred to in his letter.

Secondly. As to the amount which the committee appear to have been satisfied was overcharged, as having been paid to the printers, the undersigned in the absence of that documentary proof, which would have completely satisfied the House on this head, (but which was destroyed with other papers, not in his office, but in the Department of the Treasury,) begs leave to submit the following statement of facts, in order to refute, as publicly as it was made, the charge in this respect contained in the report of the committee. The abstract obtained from the Treasury bears date the 14th of January, 1814, as to its settlement at the Auditor's office. On the face of it, however, it is stated that the accounts settled at that time, were up to the seventh only of that month, and the probability is, they were not up to that by some days, as it is well known that papers are left for settlement at the Treasury frequently, and, indeed, always several days before they are acted upon. Application has been made by my order, two or three times, to ascertain the date of the deposit of that account at the Treasury, and have as often been answered, that the account itself, together with every accompanying voucher, is lying in ashes at the site of the former Treasury building. It is much to be regretted, and it is doing injustice to me, for the officers of the Treasury to be giving certificates, that means of transportation of public papers were everywhere to be had in abundance, when they suffered accounts and vouchers of such recent date to be burned. The papers marked Nos. 11 and 12, herewith submitted, will demonstrate, as far as evidence can be obtained, not only that these accounts were not included in the settlement of the 14th of January, 1814, but that the Clerk ought to have credit on that head for a sum of more than two thousand dollars than he claimed. The statement of Mr. Way, and the letter of Mr. Weightman, will exhibit how liable to error all estimates must be, collected in the unusual manner in which those of the committee were.

The schedule marked A, which accompanies this report, with vouchers from No. 11 to No. 17, obtained since the committee reported, will exhibit a further sum to be credited to the account of the Clerk, to the amount of about seven thousand dollars.

DECEMBER, 1814.

Tax on Personal Property—Direct Tax

H. OF R.

These amounts combined, (nearly seven thousand dollars,) with cash in hand at the commencement of this session, as estimated by the chief clerk in his statement accompanying the report of the committee, will reduce the amount of expenditures, for which vouchers are not yet obtained, to about one-half of the amount of deficiency stated by your honorable committee.

Other vouchers of a like character will be duly obtained, and the undersigned does not despair, in a seasonable time, to be able to account to the satisfaction of the House for the whole amount of the expenditures from the contingent fund. All which he respectfully solicits the House to take into their consideration.

PATRICK MAGRUDER.

Hon. SPEAKER of the House.

TAX ON PERSONAL PROPERTY.

An engrossed bill to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, or horses kept exclusively for the saddle or carriage, and on gold and silver watches, was read the third time; and on the question, that the same do pass? it passed in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 46, as follows:

TUESDAY, December 20.

The bill from the Senate, "authorizing payment to the widow of ELBRIDGE GERRY, deceased, late Vice President of the United States, of such salary as would have been payable to him during the residue of the term for which he was elected, had he so long lived," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate in relation to the amendments proposed by this House to the bill from the Senate "to authorize the President of the United States to call upon the several States and Territories thereof for their respective quotas of eighty thousand militia, for the defence of the frontiers of the United States against invasion;" and the said message was read: Whereupon, Ordered, That the bill and amendments do lie on the table.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. STOCKTON:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the constitutionality and expediency of imposing a direct tax upon the District of Columbia and the several Territories of the United States.

Mr. PEARSON moved to amend the resolution by adding the following words: "and that the Committee be instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of authorizing the several corporations within the District to impose a direct tax on the public property therein."

Mr. EPES moved that the resolution do lie on the table.—Negatived.

The question was then taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. PEARSON, and negatived.

The resolution was then agreed to by the House.

DIRECT TAX.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the whole House on the bill to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and providing for assessing and collecting the same; and the amendments reported by the Committee of the whole House being read, were, in part, concurred in, and in part disagreed to, by the House.

The said bill was further amended.

And a motion was made by Mr. SHARP further to amend the said bill by striking the words "annually" out of the following clause: "That a direct tax of six millions of dollars be hereby annually laid upon the United States."

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 50, nays 102, as follows:

Mr. YANCEY moved further to amend the said bill by adding thereto the following section:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue to be in force for and during the war in which the United States are now engaged with the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof, and until the expiration of the year in which the said war shall terminate, and no longer.

Mr. FISK, of New York, moved to amend the said section by striking out all thereof from the word "Ireland," and insert, "and for one year thereafter, and no longer." And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the said section, and was determined in the negative—yeas 61, nays 78, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, December 21.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the several petitions from inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory, relating to claims to lands derived from the British Government; which was read, and Mr. McKEE reported a bill for quieting and adjusting claims to lands in the Mississippi Territory; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House.

DIRECT TAX.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for laying a direct tax of six millions of dollars upon the United States.

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, moved to amend the bill by striking out therefrom the 41st section, which is as follows:

"SEC. 41. And be it further enacted, That, towards establishing an adequate revenue, to provide for the payment of the expenses of Government; for the punctual payment of the public debt, principal and interest, contracted, and to be contracted, according to the terms of the contracts respectively; and for creating an adequate sinking fund, gradually to reduce, and eventually to extinguish the public debt contracted, and to be contracted, the direct tax by this act laid shall continue to be laid, levied, and collected, during the present war between the United States and Great Britain, and until the purposes aforesaid shall be completely accomplished, anything in the said act of Congress to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding. And for the effectual application of the revenue, to be raised by and from the said direct tax laid by this act, and also, by and from the direct tax laid by the said act of Congress, entitled "An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States," to the purposes aforesaid, in due form of law, the faith of the United States is hereby pledged: Provided always, That, whenever Congress shall deem it expedient to alter, reduce, or change, the said direct tax by this act laid, it shall be lawful so to do, upon providing and substituting by law, at the said time, and for the same purposes, other taxes or duties, which shall be equally productive with the direct tax so altered, reduced, or changed: And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be deemed or construed in any wise to rescind or impair any specific appropriation of the said direct taxes, or either of them; but such appropriation shall remain and be carried into effect, according to the true intent and meaning of the law and laws making the same; anything in this act to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding."

On this motion a very interesting but desultory debate arose, in which MESSRS. YANCEY, CALHOUN, RHEA, LOWNDES, and TELFAIR, advocated the motion, and MESSRS. EPPES, INGERSOLL, POTTER, DUVAL, FINDLEY, GROSVENOR, HAWKINS, WEBSTER, PICKERING, NEWTON, and NELSON opposed it.

The advocates of the motion urged that they had no wish to defeat the passage of the bill, but that the spirit of the Constitution required that a direct tax should be laid only for one year, and continued no longer than imperative necessity required; that the Constitution having given to Congress the power to control the taxes, to part with it for a series of years, would be to surrender their Constitutional power, inasmuch as they could not, after giving the proposed pledge, withhold the taxes without the consent of the two other branches of the Government; that, whilst the pledge to be given might saddle the nation forever with a land tax, it was not necessary to the maintenance of the public credit, because, a sufficient sum was pledged, by the bills already passed, for the annual payment of the interest and a portion of the principal of the public debt; that this discovery of supporting public credit by pledging an annual land tax, was of recent date—for, during the Administrations of WASHINGTON and ADAMS, when the Government would naturally be most solicitous for the establishment and invigoration of public credit, a direct tax had been imposed but one year, and was then pledged, as now proposed; it was flying too suddenly from one extreme to the other, after refusing to pledge anything, to pledge all the resources of the Government, of every description, to the public creditor. Various arguments were also urged against the pledge for the continuance of this tax, derived from its general character; it was a tax, it was said, unequal in its character on different sections of the Union, and unequal in its operation frequently when not unequal in its amount, owing to the local advantages and disadvantages of different sections of the nation, and the disbursements of the Government therein. It was, besides, argued that direct taxation was the principal resource of the State governments for revenue—because, from their nature and relative situation, they cannot resort to internal taxation; and, therefore, a direct tax ought not to be overcharged, nor too long persevered in.

The arguments in opposition to the motion were various, as they proceeded from one or the other side of the House. They were, in general, to this effect: The argument against parting with the power of taxation, it was said, would apply as well to the pledges contained in the internal tax bills (against which it had not been suggested) as to this; and was besides inconclusive if correct, inasmuch as the House, by withholding appropriations, over which it had an efficient check, could at any time coerce the other branches of the Government to repeal or modify existing taxes. That, though in ordinary times, the pledges already given of the internal taxes might be sufficient to maintain public credit, it was necessary now to resuscitate that credit—in the words of one gentleman, “to dig it from the grave;” that this was a duty peculiarly devolving on those who had declared and supported the war, and on whom devolved the responsibility for its success or failure. That it would be highly unjust and partial, after pledging the taxes on the materials and labor of the artisan, mechanic, and poor retailer—after, in fact, pledging the taxes on the industry of the community—to refuse to pledge the tax on its solid wealth and landed property, &c. That this pledge of a land-tax, as a foundation for borrowing money, would be worth much more than all the internal taxes put together, because its product would be certain, whilst the products of the other taxes must be matter of estimate and conjecture. The argument that a sufficient amount of taxes was already pledged to sustain the public credit, was denied any weight, because it made the eligibility of the taxes to be pledged depend on the priority of passage of several bills which were intended and calculated to form parts of a general system of taxation, &c.

Various other points were brought into discussion, as to the intention of the framers of the Constitution in regard to the frequency and permanency of a land tax, &c., and on the merits of the present and former systems of finance, which could not be here detailed with any justice to those who introduced them.

The question being at length taken on this motion, was decided in the negative—yeas 48, nays 105, as follows:

Mr. POTTER moved to amend the 26th section of the bill, by striking out these words: “Shall, within ten days after receiving his collection list from the principal assessors, respectively, as aforesaid;” and inserting the words, “upon receiving his collection lists, shall proceed to collect the same, under the directions of the Secretary of the Treasury, on such day as shall be fixed upon by him, which day shall be uniform in all the States.”

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 52, nays 90, as follows:

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. POTTER moved to amend the bill by inserting the following as the 41st section:

SEC. 41. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall pay the full amount of his taxes on or before the first day of June, annually, shall be entitled to an abatement of twelve per centum on the amount of his taxes, to be allowed and deducted therefrom by the collector; and if not paid on said first day of June, but shall be paid on or before the first day of October, annually, he shall be allowed a deduction of six per cent. on the amount of his taxes, to be made in manner aforesaid; and every person who shall neglect to pay his taxes until after the said first day of October, shall pay interest at the rate of six per centum per annum, on the amount of his taxes, from said first day of October, until paid, to be collected together with such taxes due and payable as aforesaid.

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

THURSDAY, December 22.

A new member, to wit: from Ohio, DAVID CLENDENIN, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Rezin Beall, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "supplemental to the acts authorizing a loan for the several sums of twenty-five millions of dollars, and three millions of dollars," with an amendment; in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The amendment was read, and concurred in by the House.

On motion of Mr. EASTON, of Missouri, so much of the report of the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business as relates to the bill permitting certain locations, and granting certain donations of land in the county of New Madrid, in the Missouri Territory, was referred to a committee to report thereon.

On motion of Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, the report recently received from the Navy Department, in answer to the resolution of the House of last session, was referred to the committee of investigation on that subject, which was appointed in March last.

DIRECT TAX.

The bill to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of the Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, was read a third time.

Mr. BRIGHAM, of Massachusetts, spoke as follows: Mr. Speaker, taxing the people to raise money to enable the present Administration to perpetuate the war, has, in my opinion, no connexion with the welfare of the country, or the credit of the nation. And being opposed to the war, of course I am opposed to the passage of this bill for its support.

War is a great calamity, and blasts the happiness of those who are involved in it, and is now the occasion of the many embarrassments and distresses so sensibly felt in these United States.

Those rulers, whoever they be, and wherever they are, who hastily and unnecessarily involve a country in the horrors and mischiefs of war, are a scourge and abhorrence to any people. My anxiety for peace has been so ardent, that, at the commencement of the session, I indulged a sanguine hope that the present war, of waste and folly, was in one of its last struggles, and that its existence would soon terminate. I fear a disappointment. The Government, although unable to prosecute the war, do not seem to have ability and disposition to negotiate a peace. And in this situation, unable to do one thing or the other, tell us that they intend, if they can obtain money by taxing the people, to undertake to do what they have already found by experience that they are unable to accomplish.

DECEMBER, 1814.

To devise ways and means to raise men and money to carry on the war, were among the great and weighty matters alluded to by the President in his proclamation, and what induced him to convoke Congress, at so early a period, the present session. In obedience to his wishes and recommendations, Congress have been very industriously engaged in providing the means to enable the Administration to prosecute their schemes of misery, and have prepared a frightful increase of taxes and burdens for the citizens of the country. If the several laws which have been passed this session shall be carried into operation, they will be sensibly felt by this people, for you will take from them not only their money, but you take their personal liberty; you will take from them their children, and, in my opinion, you will take from them their Constitutional freedom. And although desperate cases may require desperate remedies, yet it does not appear to me that the present state of things, deplorable as it is, can justify the very extraordinary measures which have been adopted.

Sir, I consider this and the other revenue bills, and the army bills, component parts of one great war system, and preparatory to another Canadian campaign.

Canada is marked out by our rulers for the theatre where they intend again to exhibit their bravery and their blunders; and whoever shall see the result, will find the balance on the side of the latter; and to aid in this project, we are about to insult the miseries of the people by increasing their taxes.

This war, in my opinion, is one of the most unfortunate and distressing that ever any civilized nations voluntarily and of choice plunged themselves into. And although it is of our own choice, it is a very impolitic war; it is wrong ab initio; it was conceived in error; it was of premature birth, agonized into the world under very inauspicious circumstances, and without preparation for its support; it is like its father, of corrupt constitution, of feeble understanding, of violent passions, and not to be reasoned with; money has been its aliment, and like a vulture, it has preyed on the vitals of the country until its substance is devoured and its Treasury exhausted.

In this impoverished and distressed situation, the friends of the war say it is necessary that the people should be taxed, that the Administration may have millions more of money to prosecute the war. It does not however follow, because the Administration are destitute of money, that it is necessary or expedient that they should have more.

You would not say, in the case of a private individual, the father of a respectable and industrious family, who had neglected his social and paternal duties, wasted and expended his living and their earnings in profligacy, in rioting, and drunkenness, to their ruin and his own shame, that without any evidence of repentance or reformation, it would be necessary or expedient that he should have more money to feed his lusts and consummate their misery. So in the case before us, to say nothing of the waste of fifty thousand dollars paid to John Henry, it seems to be understood and admitted, that there has been great waste of public money in the War Department. And shall we tax the people, and raise money to put into the hands of the same agents, to be applied to the same purposes, without any evidence of reformation, or of more economy or discretion, and without any regard to the feelings and welfare of the great American family?

Common sense and common prudence forbid it; the circumstances of the people forbid it; nor do I conceive that the honor or the safety of the nation will justify it.

Mr. Speaker, the predicted embarrassments and distresses in our public affairs are before us.

We witness the loss of national prosperity; the loss of the public credit; and we witness the infirmities of our rulers, and the impolicy of their measures. And by the taxes, exactions, and impositions on the people, authorized by this and the other revenue bills already passed, we are to restore national prosperity and public credit.

I am sensible that money is wanted, and that our rulers have come to their ne plus ultra; they have worked up their stock, their Treasury notes, and their loans; they have expended their millions and tens of millions, and have accomplished no part of their object, the conquest of the Canadas.

And now in the fullness of their political wisdom, and with all the gravity of statesmen, they say that the salvation of the country depends on their having twenty or thirty millions of dollars to prosecute their system of measures and get possession of the Canadas.

The bill provides for six millions of the sum by a direct tax on the United States.

In times of difficulty like the present, it is natural to advert to the sources from whence the evils have originated.

The system of policy which was commenced in the year 1807, and which has since been in operation; whose character and objects were distinctly settled, and fully disclosed on the never to be forgotten 18th day of June, 1812, had in its rear a train of mischiefs and calamities incident to a hopeless and unnecessary war.

The country is now perplexed, the people are distressed, and the Government almost, if not altogether, bankrupt. And to restore national credit, we are by this bill to call on the people of these United States, including those of the State of Massachusetts, who are now standing on their defence against the enemy; without any support from the General Government, to advance their money, and to pay heavy taxes, to enable the Administration to prosecute a foreign war.

This nation has fallen from the elevated rank which it once held. The circumstances of the country are changed from affluence to indigence, and from glory to shame. It is humiliating when we compare the existing state of our public affairs and interest with the condition and circumstances of the nation under the Federal Administration. In the year 1801, when Mr. Jefferson came into office, he told the nation that he found their prosperity in the full tide of successful experiment. And toward the close of his Administration, he informed the people that the National Treasury was full and overflowing. How is it now? It is empty, and resembles more the exhausted receiver of an air pump than a National Treasury. Whence this mighty change from wealth to poverty? It certainly would be extraordinary that an orderly and well regulated people, under a faithful and wise Administration, should have fallen from a situation so prosperous to such a state of poverty and disgrace.

To what shall we attribute these misfortunes of the country? Our halcyon days seem to be past, and instead of peace and prosperity we have war and adversity.

The present state of things is truly alarming; there must be something rotten in the state of Denmark; and there is no rule of evidence so conclusive of the merit or demerit of an Administration as the happiness or misery of the people.

The people of these United States are depressed, but not subdued; nor will they quietly submit to be enslaved by the hands of tyranny, either foreign or domestic. They have in times past remonstrated against the oppressive measures of their own Government, but without success. And now they have nothing to expect but the increase of taxes.

It appears to me that those who now hold the destinies of this nation are as insensible of the distresses and deprivations occasioned by their measures as if they were locked up in the tomb of death.

The Administration say that they want money, and must have it. And they tell you, in language which cannot be misunderstood, that they intend to employ the money of the people and the courage of the poor to subdue the neighboring provinces. They seem to have a fatal passion for war, and with no better motive for its continuance than to revenge their own mortification.

I am ready to admit that money is the sinew of war, and I am sensible that the Government cannot carry it on without money; and am equally sensible that they cannot obtain money commensurate with their objects without oppressing the people—a people, too, who complain, and not without cause, of their public burdens; who are innocent and unoffending; who feel no interest in the success of this Canadian war, and who have not in the slightest degree been the authors of it.

I am aware that the Government are embarrassed, that money has been wasted, and that the Treasury is empty; but notwithstanding the state of our public funds, or rather no funds, I do not feel myself bound by any rule of duty, moral or political, in good conscience, or sound policy, to vote for this bill, or any other revenue bill, knowing the object to which the money is to be applied. Sir, I would sooner consent, were these taxes now assessed, collected, and the money in the hands of the Government, that it should suffer the same fate with the Navy Yard, and there be consumed, under the direction and superintendence of the President and the heads of the departments, than it should be applied to worse than waste—to the support of an offensive war.

The Government, for years, have been making experiments on the people, and, in my opinion, have been marching on in the broad road to destruction; they have expended millions of money, and are now destitute and unable to fulfil their promises or to execute their contracts. Shall they have more money to waste in the same useless manner? I say, no! Furnishing them with more money, to be applied to their schemes of aggrandizement, will seal the fate of these United States, and render their ruin more certain.

We have secured no important advantage by all the blood and treasure which have been expended for foreign conquest; we have gained nothing, either in reputation or territory, and have realized little else than disaster and suffering.

Is there not reason to call in question the moral as well as the political rectitude of the measure? And if we are fighting against Him, whose arm is omnipotent, we shall surely be defeated; we cannot succeed; we shall be disgraced, if not destroyed. I have been uniformly opposed to the present war, and do not feel sensible that I have, in my political conduct, been accessory to the deplorable situation in which the country now is; nor do I feel responsible for the present system of measures, nor for money, to enable the Administration to perpetuate the mischiefs which they have originated.

The granting of money and the laying of taxes to carry on the war against Canada, will not only increase the burdens, but the dangers of my constituents, for the character of the war I consider the same now as at its commencement.

I know it has been said by some gentlemen on the floor of this House, and denied by others, that the war has assumed a new character; that now it is a war of defence. I do not so consider it. The war of defence spoken of, is a war of the individual States, and they are forced into it by the measures of the General Government. It is a natural consequence—a result which was predicted at the time war was declared; and no man of sound understanding could imagine that the British Government, while ours were invading her provinces, would innocently float with her hundreds of ships on our extended and almost defenceless seacoast, and do nothing to divert the American forces from invading her territory.

DECEMBER, 1814.

Direct Tax.

H. OF R.

In the original compact, provision was made for the protection and defence of the several individual States, and it was considered an important provision, and of some security. But several of the States, particularly Massachusetts, derive no benefit or advantage from this provision in the Constitution.

The Administration are inattentive to their Constitutional duties; this will appear by the correspondence between Governor Strong and Mr. Monroe, Secretary of War; not only so, but the General Government have refused to indemnify Massachusetts for the expenses incurred in a war of defence, occasioned and made necessary by its own measures. An attack on Canada I consider a challenge to the enemy to molest our seaboard, and to annoy and interrupt the cities and seaport towns. And shall I, as one of the Representatives of Massachusetts, consent to load the citizens of that State with taxes to prosecute the war against Canada, and leave them to defend themselves at their own expense?

Sir, I trust that I shall never be so insensible of my duty, to the principles of justice, or so regardless of the rights and interest of my constituents. The principles of justice and of humanity, in my opinion, forbid the delegation of Massachusetts to vote for this or any other tax bill while the State is abandoned by the General Government, and that, too, in the time of peril and danger, and for no other cause than that the State declined putting her troops under the command of one of their cast-off Generals.

Though I have indirectly expressed an opinion of the duty of my colleagues, I am very sensible that they do not stand in need of my advice on this or any other subject; nor do I presume to pledge the part which they may act; I pledge no man, nor do I authorize any man to pledge me, or the part which I may act, without consultation or consent.

There is another serious objection to the imposition of these taxes. There does not appear to be any object to justify the further sacrifice of men or money. The causes of the war are removed; the Orders of Council, which were the principal ground on which the war was predicated and declared, were revoked before there was a single trespass committed; before even General Hull had issued his proclamation; before the inhabitants of Canada had been interrupted, or the laws of humanity and justice violated, and before that soil had been stained with the blood of native Americans.

At that time the enemy seemed disposed to hold out the olive branch; they proposed an armistice, but without effect. The bosom of our Executive was then so swollen with Napoleon prospects and the glory of war, and so regardless was he of the rights and interest of the people, that he laughed at their calamities, and refused to restore the blessings of peace.

He said that the war was successful, and must be continued until the claims on the subject of impressment and seamen's rights were secured, or we had appealed to arms in vain, and could no longer be considered an independent nation. Examine the subsequent documents and the letters of instructions given to the Commissioners at Ghent, and then decide on the soundness of his declaration. In the letters of instruction of the 25th and 27th of June, 1814, he authorizes the Commissioners to stipulate, that the subject of impressment, together with that of commerce, may be referred to a separate negotiation; nay, further, he instructs them that, on mature consideration, it had been decided that under all the circumstances incident to a prosecution of the war, they might omit any stipulation on the subject of impressment, and that the question might be so disposed of as to form no obstacle to a pacification.

In his letter of August the 11th, he says to the Commissioners, that the Government can go no further, because it will make no sacrifice of the rights or honor of the nation.

And hence it appears, from the President's own showing, that the war has been continued for more than two years, without having either the rights or honor of the nation for its object; which, in my mind, is highly reprehensible, and without excuse.

Another objection which I have to this bill, and the placing of more money in the hands of our rulers, is their incapacity to conduct the war. They are incompetent to manage a war of defence, much less a war of offence.

For the correctness of this remark, I will turn you to the battle of Bladensburg; there you have a specimen of the military talents of our chieftain and his associates, all of whom were struck with terror at the first appearance of the British uniform. They were terrified at the sight of an enemy they had long affected to despise. Their passion for war seemed then to be suspended; they fled where none pursued; and, with the usual courage of vain boasters, made their escape, leaving their troops to their own discretion, and the inhabitants of the city to the mercy of an exasperated enemy; and the Commander-in-Chief of the American forces put spurs to his steed, and not venturing to look back, supposed the enemy perpetually at his heels, and fled to the mountains of Virginia.

The enemy having put our army to flight, marched unmolested into the City of Washington, and there destroyed what of the public property had escaped the not less destroying hand of our rulers. And where now is your magnificent Palace; where is yonder splendid Hall, with its drapery and trappings; where are your public offices? Why, they are like the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, turned to ashes, and we are witnesses of the disgraceful catastrophe. Had the enemy with such advantages been under the command of a coward, no question but the whole city would have been laid in ruins. No sooner had the British retired, and our Commander-in-Chief been notified that he might return with perfect safety, than he, with his ordinary heroism and magnanimity, returned back into the city, calling on the nation manfully to chastise the British for their vandalism, and for frightening and driving the American Captain-General from his domicile and duty.

This event I consider a blot on the escutcheon of the American character; and had General Hull been in the command, and fled under like circumstances with or without courage, he probably would have been arrested and tried for his life by a court martial—an evil which he has once suffered, and is now the living monument of the President's sparing mercy.

The condition of the country is every day becoming more and more alarming; and the only means in our power to correct the extravagance of our rulers, and to check them in their progress to ruin, is to withhold supplies, and to do this I consider both patriotic and Constitutional.

The advocates of the war, and those who are desirous to continue it, say there is no other course for them but to pursue the present system of measures, and ask what else can they do? I will answer: change the character of the war, abandon the mad project of conquering the Canadas, deal justly with your own citizens, and magnanimously with your enemy; recall your privateers, withdraw your troops from Canada, and make it notorious that the war is really, and in fact, a war of defence. If it shall then be continued, it will become the war of the enemy, and no longer the American war for conquest.

I am sensible we have a haughty and powerful enemy to contend with, who manifest a disposition to convince the American Government that it is not for their interest to quarrel with them.

Yet I apprehend our rulers might have peace, if they were really pacific, if they would undertake to negotiate a peace in the spirit of it, and would themselves cease to do wrong, and learn to do well.

With these impressions I am opposed to the passage of this and all other bills intended to raise either money or men for the purpose of pushing the war into Canada.

We need no addition to the skirts of our Northern territory; nor shall I ever consent to purchase misery and disgrace at the price of blood and treasure.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 106, nays 53, as follows:

So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

MILITIA DRAUGHTS.

The House took up the message of the Senate announcing their agreement to some and disagreement to others of the amendments made by the House to their bill for authorizing the President of the United States to call into service 80,000 militia.

[Amongst the amendments disagreed to by the Senate, was that reducing the term of service from two years to one year, and that authorizing the Executive to make requisitions on the militia officers directly, in case of the failure of the Governors to comply with the demand made on them for this object.]

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, moved the indefinite postponement of the bill, and the amendments thereto.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, moved to lay the subject on the table, (for the purpose of taking up a more urgent message from the Senate;) which motion was opposed by Mr. LEWIS, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, and Mr. CALHOUN; and supported by Mr. INGHAM and Mr. FISK, and was negatived.

The question recurring on indefinite postponement, on which the yeas and nays were demanded, a short debate arose.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, rose, he said, to call the attention of the House to a single fact: The bill—the indefinite postponement of which was now moved—it had been stated by the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, would cost the United States twenty millions of dollars. Before encountering this vast expenditure, the House ought to feel a moral certainty that some benefit would result from it, in some degree commensurate with the magnitude of the expenditure. So far from this being the case, the strongest sentiment expressed in favor of the bill was a hope that some benefit would result from it. This amount of money, he thought, had better be expended in the old-fashioned way of procuring recruits. This bill, he added, had done more to impede the adoption of efficient measures by Congress and the Government than any bill which had been before them. The time employed on it would have been much better spent in devising means to fill the Treasury, &c., than on a bill which he believed would produce so little efficient good to the country. He trusted the House would now put an end to this project, and employ the money in the old-fashioned way of filling the ranks of the regular Army. Mr. G. purposely avoided renewing the discussion on the Constitutional question, on which he was persuaded enough had been said.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, in reply to Mr. GASTON's objections, on the score of expense, said the gentleman was perhaps not aware that—the war continuing on its present footing; the undivided power of the enemy employed against us in time to come, as it had been in time past—the Government must incur an expense for defensive purposes, in the ensuing year, of not twenty merely, but of forty millions of dollars. This was a fact from which gentlemen must not at this moment shrink. Gentlemen must remember, that, if Congress are not either able or not willing to encounter this expense, the safety of the country will be jeopardized, its existence endangered.

Mr. GASTON observed, that his objection to the expense to be caused by this bill, was not that it was too much to be expended for the defence of the country. The gentleman had misapprehended him, if he supposed that he thought any expense too great to accomplish that object. His objection was, that the bill peremptorily demanded the expenditure of so much money, without any certainty that such an expenditure would be necessary. If this law were not to pass, there yet remained in existence an act authorizing the President to call into service the militia, to serve for six months. He therefore saw no necessity for passing a law compelling him, whether he deemed it necessary or not, to call into service so many militia, to serve for so long a term.

Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, remarked, that the statement, to which allusion had been made, that this bill would cause to the United States an expense of $20,000,000, was altogether hypothetical, and he could not, for his part, see on what data it had been founded. The bill had an object in view, viz: to obtain men to carry on the war. It offered to the militiamen to be draughted, the alternative of furnishing substitutes in the shape of recruits for the regular army. If it produced regulars, it would be of the good old-fashioned sort, which the gentleman from North Carolina so much desired, which were in the same way obtained during the Revolution. If so, the very benefit would result which the gentleman desired, of recruiting the army; and, whether it had this operation or not, the statement of the expense was altogether speculative.

Mr. GHOLSON, of Virginia said, no man would go further than him to raise a powerful regular army, in any way deemed most expedient. But he considered it his bounden duty, enjoined on him by the consideration of what he owed to his country and himself, not to give his assent to any such project as that embraced in the bill now before the House. He believed it would bring ruin on the country; that it would prolong the war, by creating a dependence on a broken reed; and he was unwilling, therefore, to squander the treasure of the nation on any such project. We shall be visited next Spring by one of the most powerful armies ever seen among any people. He asked gentlemen if they were willing such an army should be met by a raw, undisciplined militia? He meant no disrespect to the militia; he acknowledged them brave and high spirited—but, if every man were as brave as Cæsar, without discipline, they would not be considered as competent to meet and contend with the veteran regulars of the enemy. As a militia bill, this would not be approved by the country; and it was nothing but a militia bill at last. Let us not, said he, turn aside from the lessons of experience. From the time of Washington to this day, few men of military character, he said, had ever recommended the adoption of such a system as this.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said it was as painful to him, and no doubt to the House, to hear arguments advanced in relation to this subject, which ought not to have one moment's influence, as to take up a single moment of the House in deliberating on a question which had been bandied about the House for weeks. He would only say that this was the only proposition which had been offered for the defence of the country, and yet it was opposed, on one hand, because it was too energetic, and on the other because it was said to be feeble and inefficient. He would not dwell on the subject; but, rather than obtrude himself on the House in debating a question on which every man's mind was made up, he would only observe, that, if this bill was rejected, they would have no dependence for defence but on six months' militia, and on that point he confidently rested the issue of this question.

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, made a few remarks, principally to show an error in the statement of the comparative utility of twenty millions as employed in the recruiting system, or in the defraying the expenses arising from the present bill. In the one case, he said, it would require another twenty millions to support for one year the troops to be recruited, and in the other, the twenty millions would suffice for one year's maintenance. The present bill would, he believed, produce a regular force; it might, however, produce a militia force, which, if such were the effect of the bill, would be of a quality superior, from their extended term of service, to ordinary militia.

The question of indefinite postponement was decided in the negative. For the motion 69, against it 83, as follows:

The SPEAKER then proceeded to state the amendments of this House, in which the Senate has refused to concur.

The first of these amendments was, that which proposes to strike out two years and insert one, as the term for which the draughts shall be held to service.

Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, moved that the House recede from this amendment, so as to fix two years as the term of service.

The question on this motion was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative—for the motion 59, against it 93, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Bard, Barnett, Bines, Bowen, Brown, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Clendenin, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Denoyelles, Evans, Findley, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Gourdin, Griffin, Hall, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Johnson of Kentucky, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Leferts, Lyle, McKim, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Rea of Pennsylvania, Robertson, Sage, Sharp, Smith of Pennsylvania, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Williams, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Yancey.

So the term of service remains, at present, one year.

The House having refused to recede from this amendment, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky moved that the House insist on it; which motion was agreed to.

The House then proceeded, separatim, to insist on all its amendments to which the Senate had disagreed, and a committee of conference was appointed to join the committee of the Senate on that subject.

FRIDAY, December 23.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "giving further time to locate certain claims to lands confirmed by an act of Congress, entitled "An act confirming certain claims to lands in the district of Vincennes," with amendments; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, reported a bill to authorize the President of the United States to raise certain companies of rangers for the defence of the frontiers of the United States, and to repeal certain acts heretofore passed on this subject; which was twice read and committed.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

On motion of Mr. FISK, of New York, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America.

The first section of the bill contains the leading principles of the bill, substantially as follows: The capital to consist of fifty millions of dollars, to be divided into an hundred thousand shares of five hundred dollars each; subscriptions for forty millions whereof to be opened on the third Monday in January next, at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Richmond, Charleston, and Pittsburg. [The amendments proposed to this section by the Committee of Ways and Means contemplate an extension of the number of places of subscription, &c.] Before the question was stated on these amendments—

Mr. CLOPTON, of Virginia, moved to strike out the first section of the bill.

I have made this motion, Mr. Chairman, (said Mr. CLOPTON.) at this stage of the discussion, as being at the most proper time to try the general principle of the bill; because I cannot, under my present convictions, vote for this or any other bill to establish a bank, and therefore wish to state to this Committee the ground of Constitutional objection which I have to it. The objection is not one which admits a right to legislate on the subject proposed, but would prescribe the precise extent to which it might be exercised, and beyond which it ought not to be exercised; but it is an objection grounded on a thorough belief, the result of deliberate examination of the Constitution and reflection thereon, that there does not exist in this body any manner of right to legislate on the subject at all; that no sort of authority to do so is vested in it, either by express grant, or as incidental to any express grant.

I should, indeed, have been glad if some gentleman who patronises this scheme would have presented to us his views of the authority which he conceives the Constitution has given to pass such a bill as this; that, if I had been convinced of having been heretofore in error, I might have been left free to decide upon the measure, accordingly as it should appear to be expedient or otherwise; but, no gentleman having done so in the course of a long discussion of the bill on the same subject, which was before this body some time ago, when I was in a very low state of health, and expecting that the same silence in that respect will be observed upon this bill, I am left to presume altogether as to the ground on which the friends of the scheme rest for their authority; and, being left so to presume, I cannot conceive of any part of the Constitution on which they can rely for authority, other than the concluding clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, commonly called the sweeping clause, in the following words: "To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," &c. Because there is no other part of the Constitution, that I know of, which can afford even a shadow of pretext for exercising such a power as is now proposed to be exercised by the bill before you. Because, upon every occasion which has heretofore occurred, when a right has been claimed to exercise a distinct power or powers, not expressly granted, for the avowed purpose of carrying into execution other powers that are so granted, that clause has been always resorted to; and, more especially, because the Secretary of the Treasury, the original parent of this scheme, in his letter to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the 17th of October last, after modestly suggesting the propriety of a change of opinion respecting the Constitution, to suit the "difference of times and circumstances," wound up his recommendation of the scheme with a declaration of his "opinion, that in these times it will not only be useful in promoting the general welfare, but that it is necessary and proper for carrying into execution some of the most important powers constitutionally vested in the Government;" thus using the most operative words of that clause, the words "necessary and proper for carrying into execution," &c., and evidently thereby inviting the attention of the members of this body to the clause, as being of singular importance in guiding their deliberations on the subject.

It would seem, sir, nevertheless, that even in the mind of the Secretary himself, there existed at least some doubt whether a power to establish the proposed bank is itself constitutionally vested in Congress; for he does not say that it is, but only that in his opinion "the establishment of a National Bank is necessary and proper for carrying into execution" some powers that are constitutionally vested in the Government, as if he intended to confine the actual Constitutional investiture to powers expressly granted. If he did intend so to confine it, he was thus far correct; for no power whatever is constitutionally vested in this body that is not expressly granted to it.

Let the opinion of the Secretary on this point be what it may, his letter will not, cannot, induce me to participate in the exercise of a power which, I verily believe, is not in any manner whatever vested in this body. Even if the measure proposed should seem ever so expedient, which, however, is far from appearing to me to be the case with respect to the proposed institution; but, on the contrary, should it be established, I fear it may ultimately turn out to be a dangerous, a very dangerous political machine to this country, even if some temporary advantages should be derived from it; if some of the difficulties under which the Government is said to labor should, for the present, be obviated—difficulties, I am constrained to say, which might have been prevented by timely provisions, by other means not in any way conflicting with the Constitution—which might have precluded that great necessity, as it is represented to be, and now spoken of by some gentlemen, as in their opinion so imperiously calling for such an institution as the one proposed. But, sir, I am not prepared, nor am I willing, to admit that the Government is in such a desperate situation as to render the proposed bank necessary for its relief or accommodation, even if the right to establish the institution was unquestionable. I deny that such necessity does exist. On this occasion, therefore, as on others, I take the liberty to decide according to the dictates of my own judgment. If in this instance I judge upon mere visionary speculation in respect to the Constitution, let the observations I am about to offer to the Committee determine.

In tracing the features of the Federal Constitution, Mr. Chairman, I have always found that they present themselves to my mind as being rooted in one great fundamental principle, which is, that all the powers at the command of this Government are those only which are delegated to it. This principle is expressly recognised by an amendment to the Constitution, adopted at a very early period after the Constitution was carried into operation. The term "delegated," as used in that amendment, I consider to be a peculiar phrase of special, distinct, definite meaning, and, when applied to any particular power, not fairly susceptible of implication or involution of any distinct power, other than the power to which it is immediately and directly applied. In other words, sir, I understand the term to mean that the powers "delegated," are those only which are specifically designated by express grants. The delegation of the powers of this Government comprehends, then, no more than what are distinctly expressed in the delegation or series of positive grants.

A sort of powers, however, has been much and often spoken of, the true nature and extent of which, perhaps, have not been always distinctly and clearly understood—if, indeed, the existence of any powers at all under that denomination ought to be admitted. I allude to what are called incidental powers. The broadest latitudinarians, in relation to the powers of this body, have never, that I know of, extended their notions of its powers farther than to these two species—the powers strictly denominated “delegated” powers, or powers “expressly granted,” and what they call “incidental” powers. This notion of incidental powers is deduced altogether from the same concluding clause of the 8th section of the first article of the Constitution, as being “necessary and proper” for carrying into execution the express powers specified in the preceding clauses of that section; and very much, if not the whole, of the diversity of opinion which has prevailed in relation to the powers constitutionally vested in Congress, has proceeded, perhaps, from the difference between the construction given to that clause by some, and the construction given to it by others.

H. or R.

Bank of the United States.

According to my understanding of the word “incidental,” I take it to be an adjective not only in point of grammar strictly, but that, if it can properly be applied to any power at all, it can be applied only to a power which is itself but the adjective or adjunct of another power to which it belongs, and has no existence separate from that power. In my opinion, then, what is commonly called incidental powers are not real, distinct powers, but rather modes of exercising the express powers to which they belong or are incident. Whence, sir, I consider myself perfectly justifiable in the declaration that the clause in the Constitution, which has been mentioned, and by which alone it is generally thought the exercise of those supposed incidental powers is authorized, does not embrace any distinct substantive power at all. The power now proposed to be exercised in passing the bill before you, I consider to be a distinct substantive power, as clearly as any power can be, and therefore not embraced in that clause. It is not expressly granted, as must be admitted by everybody; whence it is evident to my mind, that it is not in any manner whatever vested in this body, and therefore cannot be constitutionally exercised by this body.

Firmly, then, as the Secretary of the Treasury or other advocates of this bill may conceive the doctrine, they entertain in favor of it, to be supported by the clause in the Constitution which has been mentioned, I must beg leave to differ from them entirely in opinion. I consider it affording no solid, no substantial support at all to such a doctrine; and never in my opinion was an appellation more improperly bestowed upon anything than the appellation which has been bestowed upon that clause. On account, then, of the very extensive latitude of construction given to the clause, ascribing to it abundantly more force than it actually possesses, I have been inclined to think that it might have been better, perhaps, if the clause had never been inserted in the Constitution; or, at least, that part of it which relates to the several grants of power specified in the preceding clauses of the section. For so far from sweeping, by which it would seem, is meant (if indeed the appellation is designed to mean anything,) a carrying along with it powers not specified in the enumeration of grants immediately preceding the clause, it carries along with it nothing at all. It imparts not a scintilla of power to Congress which the preceding enumeration does not grant. If then by the ascription to it of the sweeping quality be really meant that it imparts to Congress powers other than those enumerated in the preceding clause of the section, which are distinct from and additional to them, indefinite in number and extent, a little reflection. I should imagine, might convince any one that such construction must involve dangerous consequences—that such would be a sweeping quality indeed—that it might sweep away not only all the restrictions intended by the specification of those particular grants of power, but also every vestige of authority reserved to the States. Yes, sir, such must be its quality, such the extent of its force, if it be allowed that the clause conveys to Congress any real substantive powers not contained in the special grants enumerated; for if it be admitted that it conveys any such additional powers at all, since they are not defined, they would consequently be general as well as unlimited. To give to the clause, then, the full force which the appellation by which it has been distinguished, were it a proper appellation for it, would be in fact to give to Congress general, unlimited, discretionary powers. I presume, sir, that nothing would be hazarded by the declaration, were I to take upon myself to affirm that not a single member of this honorable body will admit that it contains a grant of such general, discretionary powers. Hence, sir, it is clear to my mind that those, who ascribe to the clause in question the quality which seems to have been ascribed to it, must be involved in the dilemma of either advocating so great an extent of power as existing in this body, as would render altogether useless and nugatory the special grants of power enumerated in the Constitution, and therefore much more power than they would really be willing to allow it to convey; or of admitting at last that it conveys none at all more than what the enumeration of itself grants without that clause. Hence too it is equally clear to me that, so far from conferring on this body any real powers additional to those described in the preceding enumeration, the clause is merely the recognition of a general principle, necessarily inherent in each grant of power, that Congress being invested with the power, may use or authorize by law a use of the natural appropriate means of carrying the power into execution, for which purpose alone such means can be used, the application of them depending entirely upon the exercise of the power granted, and without which right all the several grants expressed would be merely so many naked grants, and would convey to this body no such powers as the grants purport to convey.

Permit me, sir, to illustrate the position, I have now advanced, by a reference to one of the special grants of power enumerated; I say one of them, because it would be unnecessary to trouble the Committee with any more, although observations similar to these about to be made on the one selected might be made upon all, or nearly all of them, tending equally to establish the truth of the position, but which would require more time than perhaps it might be either convenient or agreeable to the Committee to be detained; and because it is believed that the observations on one of them may suffice for my purpose as amply as if I were to trouble the Committee with similar remarks on all of them. I will take the first grant enumerated in these words: "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," &c. To this grant let the clause in question be applied, and the recognition of the principle I have mentioned, may, I think, be clearly perceived. What is its operation? The words of the grant expressly confer on Congress a specific power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. Now, sir, does this grant operate no further than merely to authorize Congress to provide by law that "taxes, duties," &c. on certain articles, at certain rates, or to certain amounts, shall be laid and collected, and to do no more? To confine its operation to this limit would be to ascribe no efficient meaning, to give no force at all to the words lay and collect. But they certainly have such meaning; they certainly have some force; and from the operation of the general principle, such as I have alluded to, which is necessarily inherent in the grant of "power to lay and collect taxes, duties," &c., Congress becomes vested with a right to authorize by law a use of the natural, appropriate means of causing taxes, duties, &c., to be laid and collected, which in fact is nothing more than an efficient exercise of the simple "power to lay and collect taxes, duties," &c., such as to authorize by law the establishment of custom-houses; rules for the entrances and clearances of vessels; the employment of public armed vessels about the mouths of rivers or other inlets and on the coasts to prevent smuggling and evasions of duties directed by law to be laid on imports; the appointments of collectors, inspectors and other necessary officers for collection of the revenues arising therefrom and conveyance of them into the Treasury. So also in relation to the system of internal taxation lately established, and now enlarged, as appropriate means of carrying the system into effect, the appointments of a commissioner of that revenue, collectors, assessors and other necessary officers, and rules of proceeding in every case of taxation have been all authorized by law for the purposes of levying the taxes and bringing them into the use of the Government.

Now, sir, I beg leave to ask, would not Congress have had a Constitutional right to make laws authorizing all the several proceedings, I have just noticed, if the clause, which has been cited, had never been inserted at the end of the section which has been mentioned? Can there exist any doubt respecting its authority to have done so? It seems to me that not a shadow of ground for doubting its authority would have existed, but that the words "shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," convey to this body the same extent of authority as the grant would, if it had been expressed that Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, by making the necessary and proper laws for laying and collecting them. For a legislature cannot lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, or excises, but by making some law or laws for laying and collecting them; that is to say, some law or laws appropriate to the purposes of laying and collecting them.

The "power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises" is the same, then, as a power to make laws which shall be "necessary and proper" to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises. But to make laws which shall be "necessary and proper" to lay and collect taxes, duties, &c., is the same as to make laws, which shall be "necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, &c. Hence, then, a power to make laws, which shall be "necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, is the same as, and can be no more than, the simple power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises." It is evident, therefore, to my mind, sir, that what have been generally called powers incidental to express powers are not real, distinct powers, but nothing more than modes of exercising the express powers to which they belong, or using the natural, appropriate means of carrying them into execution, which are the only purposes, for which the means are required and to which only they can be applied; the objects, on which they can operate, being those only on which the express powers, to which they respectively belong, are exercised; that nothing more is comprehended within the meaning of the words "to make all laws, which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," &c., contained in the clause which has been characterized as the sweeping clause and to which so extensive a scope has been given.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the words "to make all laws, which shall be necessary and proper," instead of having been inserted at the end of the section, had been inserted in the first grant between the word "power," and the words "to lay and collect taxes, duties," &c., so as to have made the clause read thus, "Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to lay and collect taxes, duties," &c., would any gentleman contend that Congress under this grant, so modified, would have a Constitutional right to exercise, as the means of laying and collecting taxes, duties, &c., a distinct substantive power, not expressed in the grant, and not necessarily belonging to the power of laying and collecting taxes, duties, &c., but which could be exercised independently of the exercise of that power, and operate on objects not at all connected with the exercise of it? Surely not; yet, it is the same thing to contend that those words of the clause at the end of the section, contain a grant of such power; for they apply to each special grant of power enumerated in the same manner, and only in the same manner, as if they had been incorporated into the body of each grant respectively. Nothing can be more clear and evident than that the words so apply, and so only. Nevertheless, sir, this famous clause has been so construed, and, I suppose, still is so construed, as to give to Congress separate, distinct, substantive powers, not expressed in the enumeration of grants. Expediency is made the basis of such construction; and from an opinion entertained by some gentlemen, that the proposed banking institution may afford a useful engine to the Government in its financial arrangements; though the correctness of that opinion is controverted by others, and is upon the whole extremely problematical: yet from their opinion merely of its expediency a right to establish the institution is claimed, and now in rapid exercise; although nothing can be more evident, than that to do so is to exercise a distinct, substantive power not contained in the enumeration—a power as distinct, and as substantive as any of those enumerated are with respect to the others on the list. This observation leads me, sir, and indeed almost irresistibly impels me, to bring to the notice of the Committee one particular grant of power enumerated, so extremely apt in my opinion, and well fitted is it for a further illustration of the principles I contend for—it is the power “to establish post offices and post roads.”

Here, sir, is a power distinctly expressed in the enumeration of so much importance to the Government in affording ready, convenient and expeditious means of conveyance of intelligence, to and from every department, every branch and every individual member of every branch and department of the Government, as well as to and from the citizens of the United States at large, as to render it almost absolutely necessary for carrying on the affairs of the Government. Yet we see this power expressly designated in the enumeration. Why do we see it here expressly designated? For this very obvious and undeniable reason—that it is a power completely substantive in its nature, distinct and separate from, and independent of all others enumerated. Whence the framers of the Constitution, from a consideration of its great importance to the General Government, and the manifest propriety of vesting it in this Government, took care to insert it in the enumeration of express grants—well knowing that it could not by any possible just construction be considered as the incident of any of those express grants; and consequently that, however necessary and proper it might be for carrying on the affairs of the Government, such a power could not be constitutionally exercised, unless inserted among the express grants.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will seriously, I will solemnly address myself to the members of this honorable body, and ask, Will any gentleman undertake to say that a power to establish such an institution as the one now proposed—an institution of such vast moment, involving interests so deep, so extensive, so fathomless, indeed, as almost to baffle the powers of human language to describe them; an institution, which, if established, as was said, and justly said, by a gentleman from New York (Mr. OAKLEY) some time ago in relation to the bill on the same subject then under discussion, will be likely to wield the destinies of this nation for ages to come—I say, sir, will any gentleman undertake to affirm that a power to establish such a monstrous institution as this, is not a power as completely substantive in its nature as the power to establish post offices, and to direct that the mails shall be carried on certain roads? Sir, is the sun shining in his meridian splendor clearer to the eye than it must be to every mind, high and low, wise and ignorant, that a power to create so terrific and stupendous an establishment as this, is no less a substantive power and no less distinct and separate from, and independent of, all other whatever, than is the power to establish post offices and post roads? Sir, this is too clear and too plain to need any illustration. It would be but an idle waste of time, indeed, to trouble the Committee with any observations upon it, with a view of attempting to prove more clearly that it is such a power; and if gentlemen are determined to assume the power, the exercise of it will be totally unconnected with that of any of the express powers enumerated in the Constitution, and its operation is independent of their operation as the power itself is independent of all those express powers. These are the characteristic properties of a distinct, substantive power. Strange, I think, must be the construction, then, which interprets it to be a power merely incidental to either of those express powers; and, since it is not itself one of them, my impressions are irresistible, that it is not in any matter vested in this body, and therefore cannot be constitutionally exercised by it.

Sir, if the doctrine, under which this power is assumed and exercised, should be generally tolerated and sanctioned—if this vast unlimited latitude of construction should become the established construction of the clause in the Constitution, which has been so often referred to, what will become of the great landmarks of the Constitution? Will they not in effect be all levelled with the ground? Will not the wide unbounded ocean of human affairs be then laid open to this restricted Federal Legislature, (as everybody, who pretends to know anything of the principles of the Constitution, acknowledges it to be,) to select from them such subjects as it may choose, as bases of its laws? Surely, sir, it will. All the restrictions contained in the Constitution, which have been marked out by the specification of particular powers, as limitations to Congress in legislating for these United States, will be swept away, will be annihilated; and there will be nothing to hinder a course of legislation from being pursued without restraint, without any limitation whatever but its own discretion, as to what it may determine upon as necessary or proper to be done. Sir, can a single object fall within the compass of the human imagination, which may not be also drawn within the scope of this boundless construction, and according to it be deemed a legitimate subject of Congressional legislation? Not one, sir. Every possible object of human legislation, not palpably repugnant to the first principles of our nature, of which the mind can conceive, under this very extensive construction may as well and as rightfully form a basis of legislation for this body, as the subject on which it is now acting. Admit this doctrine as correct, and in vain, sir, has your Constitution been framed upon the principles that, "the powers, not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or the people." In vain has this hallowed principle been solemnly recognised and expressly incorporated into the Constitution by way of amendment. In vain have the people of these States confided in this great fundamental principle as a solemn and safe guarantee of their State sovereignties. There is not a single power heretofore considered as reserved, and heretofore deemed sacred to the States, which may not be as rightfully exercised by this body, as the power now proposed to be exercised by it; for I aver that not a single power is more completely reserved to the States, under the Constitution, than this power is—that, if this power is not reserved, no power whatever is reserved to them; and it would be preposterous indeed, to talk or think of reserved powers at all. But, sir, I undertake to aver that this power is not delegated to this body, either expressly or incidentally, and I do consider an exercise of it by this body as an unauthorized assumption, as an usurpation not only not warranted, but absolutely forbidden to it by the Constitution. I assert, then, that this monstrous construction operates no less than a complete reversal of the great and essential principle, which has been spoken of—introduces the fatal, destructive one, that all powers whatever are delegated to the United States which are not expressly reserved to the States; and, in effect, converts this Government of special, defined, express powers, into one entire consolidated Government, of general undefined powers.

Let this alarming doctrine be fully confirmed and established, what a fatal verification will it be of the presages of some of our venerable statesmen, whose mortal remains have been long since mouldering in the grave! At the ever memorable and important epoch when the people of these States were called upon to deliberate on the great and interesting question relating to the adoption of this Constitution, the minds of many were impressed with serious, with solemn, with awful apprehensions, mingled with no small degree of alarm that the very clause in the 8th section of the first article of the Constitution, which has been so often cited, might be resorted to as a ground for legislating to an extent never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution as being within the scope of its true and legitimate meaning. It was feared that the term "necessary" contained in the clause, though qualified and restricted in its meaning by the addition of the term "proper," from the union and combination of which two qualities it was manifestly intended to apply the clause to the making of such laws only, as should have an immediate relation to, and a natural, intimate connexion with the enumerated express powers, as means or instruments of carrying them efficiently into execution, might nevertheless be so perverted as to have a construction given to the clause not confined to the limits embraced within that intention, but arbitrarily extended to laws having no manner of relation to, and no sort of natural connexion with any of those express powers—that such a principle of construction once established, the time might come when it would expand itself to the widest circuit of human discretion. The American people in general were satisfied, however, to receive the Constitution as proposed, with that clause in it, resting their hopes upon the principles and structure of it, that these were sufficiently clear and explicit to guard against the abuses and dangers so much apprehended by some.

Now, Mr. Chairman, will the thirteenth Congress of the United States, fatally to those hopes, fatally to the pleasing expectations then entertained by the people, who adopted this Constitution—will they so soon verify the presages which have been alluded to? Will they in the re-establishment of so dangerous a precedent, which was thought to have been happily demolished but three or four years ago by a refusal to recharter a similar institution—will they, I say at so early a period after that event, by a creation of the proposed huge mammoth institution, sufficiently capacious to swallow up four or five of the former establishments, thus hermetically seal and secure perhaps forever the groundwork of future assumptions of power, and this too by adopting a measure of itself fraught with inconceivable danger, the natural tendency of which will be gradually, at least, if not rapidly (and if such a sad misfortune must befall this country, I pray that it may be but gradual) to break down the barriers of the Constitution and sweep away the restrictions and limitations of power marked out by the specification of particular grants as designated in the Constitution? Sir, should such a state of things ever arrive—should such ever be the condition of this country—when this Legislature should so entirely change its true character—when it should no longer confine its proceedings to the limits of its "delegated" powers and the great leading principles of the Constitution—when these principles should be disregarded and cease to have any force, who could undertake to say how far an evil of such great magnitude might not progress? No man, I undertake to affirm, could prophetically explore the full extent of its progress.

It is not much to be wondered at, perhaps, that gentlemen should differ in opinion as to the extent in which a power, though expressly granted, ought to be exercised, when that power is in its nature limited, or qualified by the terms of the grant, to which different gentlemen may give different constructions, as on several recent occasions we have witnessed. But when a power is assumed which is not even mentioned in the Constitution, I must confess, sir, it appears to me as something much more extraordinary. If an erroneous construction in the first case should prevail at one time, the evil will be remedied, perhaps, by a more correct construction at another time, the express power being always a fixed, defined standard, to which the mind can resort; and therefore the precedent is not likely to be as durable and dangerous as in the latter case, where mere arbitrary interpretation, or opinion, having at any time prevailed, upon the general ground of necessity or expediency, without any such fixed, defined standard to judge by, one assumption is much more likely to form a durable precedent for future similar assumptions from time to time in succession, and consequently so much the more dangerous. If, therefore, it be not too late—if gentlemen have not irrevocably made up their minds upon this subject, I would beseech this honorable assembly to consider, to pause for a while, to meditate on a subject of such vast magnitude before they come to such irrevocable decision in favor of it, and not precipitately hurry into the adoption of a measure so big with momentous, incalculable consequences—consequences, the extent of which the keenest foresight of man cannot now discern—the baneful influences of the evils of which may be such as the most eagle-eyed statesman our country produces may not be able to trace, until they shall have extended themselves beyond the reach of any practicable remedy!

When Mr. CLORTON had concluded—the question being about to be put on his motion without debate—

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, took the floor. Among the most alarming indications of the times, he remarked, was the apathy which pervaded the House on this occasion; an apathy resembling the numbness which generally precedes mortal dissolution, under the influence of which a question of such importance as this was about to be taken without debate and almost without deliberation. If the bill would produce that effect which its friends predicted, it would prove a beneficial and valuable institution; if fraught with the mischiefs which he saw in it, its passage would bring with it certain destruction to the nation. He took it for granted, from the course of proceedings which had taken place in the House when this subject was before under consideration, that all hope of obtaining a bank at all resembling what banks have heretofore been, must now cease; and that the institution embraced by this bill, if it passed, would be a mere paper bank, and nothing else, from which no benefit could result to the Government or the community. He examined the character of this bill, and particularly objected to the extent of the capital; the limited proportion of specie to be employed in it; and the power to suspend specie payments. Upon a full view of all its features, he denied that it would restore public credit, or establish an adequate circulating medium, the purposes which its friends hoped it would accomplish. It would, on the contrary, from the moment of its establishment, give birth to a monstrous scene of stock-jobbing and speculation, always detrimental to the public credit. By a system of rigid economy and carrying into effect the taxes agreed to by the House, he said, he had some hope that the Government would weather the storm with which it was assailed, without national bankruptcy; but, if Congress passed a bill of this kind, he conscientiously believed it would not be possible to avoid the evil; and that, if they passed this, they might as well at the same time pass a bill of national bankruptcy.

Mr. McKIM, of Maryland, said without saying how he should vote on the final question, he should vote against the motion to strike out the first section of the bill in the present stage of it, from motives of respect to the co-ordinate branch of the Legislature from which the bill came, and to those who advocated the bill in this House.

The motion to strike out the first section of the bill was then decided in the negative by the following vote: For striking it out 50, against it 71.

Mr. FISK then briefly explained the character of this bill, and in what respect the amendments proposed by the committee would change the features of it. The bill, as it came from the Senate, and as it now stands, proposes that the forty millions to be subscribed by individuals, shall be at the rate of twenty-seven millions of dollars in war stock, five millions in specie, and eight millions in Treasury notes; and that subscriptions shall be opened in Boston, Baltimore, New York, Philadelphia, Richmond, Charleston, and Pittsburgh. The committee had recommended to reduce the proportion subscribable by individuals to thirty-five millions, of which twenty to be in public stock, five in specie, and ten in Treasury notes. The details of the bill being nearly the same as those of the bill originally reported in this House, were not proposed to be changed, except that the committee had recommended that books of subscription should be opened at one place in every State, in conformity with what appeared to be the sentiment of the House when the bill was before under consideration.

The amendments proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means to the bill were separately considered, and agreed to by a considerable majority.

The Committee proceeded in further consideration of the bill—rose, after 4 o'clock, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

SATURDAY, December 24.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 23d ultimo, the report of the Secretary of War, relating to an uniform system of discipline for the Army of the United States, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to appoint a Board of Officers, to modify "the rules and regulations for the field exercise and manœuvres of the French Infantry," as translated by Macdonald, so as to make them correspond with the organization of the Army of the United States, and to make such additions and retrenchments as may be thought proper; and to lay the same, as soon as possible, before this House.

The resolution was read, and agreed to.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "giving further time to locate certain claims to lands confirmed by an act of Congress, entitled "An act confirming certain claims to lands in the District of Vincennes," were read, and concurred in by the House.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

On motion of Mr. Fisk, of New York, the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America.

The whole of the day was consumed in the discussion of the details and propositions to amend this bill, without giving birth to any material amendments.

The amendments made in the Committee were reported to the House, and agreed to, before the House adjourned.

As amended, the bill exhibits the following features, viz:

The capital to consist of fifty millions of dollars, divided into shares of five hundred dollars each; subscribable and payable as follows: by the Government, in stock to bear an interest of four per cent. per annum; fifteen millions, by individuals; the remaining thirty-five millions, payable as follows, viz: five millions in specie, ten millions in Treasury notes, and twenty millions in what is usually called the war-stock. The bank to commence its operations so soon as eleven million five hundred thousand dollars are paid in, in the proportions before mentioned, of specie, Treasury notes and stock.

Other amendments were proposed to the bill; when the House adjourned, without taking a question on the bill's going to a third reading.

MONDAY, December 26.

Mr. TROUP, from the managers appointed by this House to attend a conference with the managers on the part of the Senate, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments proposed by the House of Representatives to the bill from the Senate "to authorize the President of the United States to call upon the several States and Territories thereof for their respective quotas of eighty thousand militia, for the defence of the frontiers of the United States against invasion," made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MATTHEW GUY.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, rose to make a motion. He said there was now an individual in this town, by the name of Matthew Guy, a native of the town of Dumfries, who, by an extraordinary act of bravery and heroism, had himself captured a British officer and four British seamen. He was in an oyster boat in the neighborhood of Chippewanzie, into which he was pursued by a British vessel; and, after he got into the creek, a barge was sent after him with a midshipman and four men. This individual, finding he must be overtaken, went ashore in a small skiff, and concealed himself on the margin of the creek with his duck-gun, directing a mulatto man who was the only person in company with him, to pursue his way up the creek. The mulatto man accordingly steered up the creek, under a sharp fire from the barge which was in pursuit. When the barge passed within a convenient distance, Mr. Guy discharged his gun with such steady aim at it, as to wound four of the five men on board, who immediately cried for quarter; which being readily granted, they pushed ashore while Guy was loading his gun a second time. On finding the inferiority of force to which they had surrendered their arms, the prisoners were disposed to attempt a rescue; but their captor presented his piece a second time at them, and they deemed it proper to submit, the officer and three others being already wounded. The brave man who performed this exploit, delivered his prisoners up to the militia in St. Mary's county, by whom they had been brought to the city. Though this case did not come within the letter, he said it certainly did within the equity of the law, which allows a bounty of one hundred dollars on every prisoner taken by privateers; because this individual had redeemed from captivity one of our naval officers and four of our seamen by obtaining the means of their exchange; which was the principle on which the act in question was passed. He was desirous to extend the provision of that bill to this individual; and therefore moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing a bounty to Matthew Guy, for five English prisoners captured by him.

The motion was agreed to without opposition.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate "to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America;" and the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole to the said bill being again read, were amended, and severally concurred in by the House, except the amendment which goes to add a new section to the bill.

The said section was further amended.

The question was then taken to concur with the Committee of the Whole in the said new section, which is as follows:

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That it shall at all times be lawful for a committee of either House of Congress, appointed for that purpose, to inspect the books, and to examine into the proceedings of the corporation hereby created; and to report whether the provisions of this charter have been by the same violated or not. And whenever any committee, as aforesaid, shall find and report, or the President of the United States shall have reason to believe, that the charter has been violated, it may be lawful for Congress to direct, or the President to order, a scire facias to be sued out of the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania, in the name of the United States, (which shall be executed upon the President of the corporation for the time being, at least fifteen days before the commencement of the term of said court,) calling on the said corporation to show cause wherefore the charter hereby granted shall not be declared forfeited: And it shall be lawful for the said court, upon the return of the said scire facias, to examine into the truth of the alleged violation, and if such violation be made appear, then to pronounce and adjudge that the said charter is forfeited and annulled: Provided, however, Every issue of fact which may be joined between the United States and the corporation aforesaid, shall be tried by jury. And it shall be lawful for the court aforesaid to require the production of such of the books of the corporation as it may deem necessary for the ascertainment of the controverted facts, and the final judgment of the circuit court aforesaid shall be examinable in the Supreme Court of the United States by writ of error, and may be there reversed or affirmed, according to the usages of law.

The concurrence of the House in this amendment was opposed by Mr. INGHAM of Pennsylvania, Mr. FORSYTH of Georgia, and Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky; and supported by Mr. GASTON of North Carolina, Mr. SHEFFEY of Virginia, Mr. OAKLEY of New York; and opposed and advocated by other gentlemen.

The question on concurrence therein was decided in the affirmative.—For concurrence 95, against it 36, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bard, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Bowen, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Caperton, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Clendenin, Clifton, Cooper, Cox, Crawford, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Desha, Earl, Ely, Evans, Farrow, Fisk of Vermont, Forney, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Gourdin, Hale, Hall, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Henderson, Humphreys, Hulbert, Irving, Jackson of Rhode Island, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Law, Lovett, Lowndes, Macon, Markell, McKee, McLean, Miller, Montgomery, Moseley, Nelson, Newton, Oakley, Parker, Pearson, Pickering, Pleasants, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Ringgold, Robertson, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sharp, Sheffey, Sherwood, Shipherd, Slaymaker, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Stockton, Slagart, Taylor, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Yancey.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Anderson, Archer, Bines, Brown, Comstock, Conard, Creighton, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis of Pa., Findley, Forsyth, Griffin, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Ingersoll, Ingham, Kerr, Kershaw, King of Massachusetts, Lefferts, Lyle, McCoy, Moore, Murfree, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Sage, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Strong, Tannehill, Telfair, Udree, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

And on motion, the House adjourned until tomorrow.

TUESDAY, December 27.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a representation from James Monroe, acting Secretary of State; Alexander J. Dallas, Secretary of the Treasury; and Richard Rush, Attorney General, Commissioners appointed by the act "providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory," commonly called the Yazoo claims, passed on the 31st of March, 1814, representing their inability, owing to the multiplied and laborious duties which demand their attention in their respective departments, to discharge the duties enjoined upon them by the said act, and suggesting the propriety of appointing other Commissioners to execute the provisions of the act, whose attention shall not be engrossed by other public duties. The said representation was read, and referred to Messrs. OAKLEY, LOWNDES, and BAYLIES, of Massachusetts.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill regulating the sale of certain reserved sections of land in the State of Ohio; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

Mr. McKEE also reported a bill attaching to the Canton district, in the State of Ohio, the tract of land lying between the foot of the rapids of the Miami of Lake Erie and the Connecticut Western Reserve; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill last mentioned.

MILITIA DRAUGHTS.

On motion of Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, the House proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill to authorize the President of the United States to call into service eighty thousand militia for the defence of the frontiers of the United States.

The first proposition of the committee relates to the term of service of the militia, and proposes that a compromise between the two Houses shall take place, the Senate receding six months and the House advancing six months in the service, so as to fix it at eighteen months.

Mr. TROUP explained that this report was the result of compromise between the two Houses; and Mr. STOCKTON stated that, though he had consented, as a member of the committee of conference, to the report being made, he was opposed to it, as was a majority of the conference committee of this House.

Mr. FARROW made a short speech in opposition to the report, the object of which was to explain the reason why he, who had voted in favor of the bill, should now vote against this report; it was, because he considered the militia character of the bill to be changed, and that, as proposed to be amended, it would possess the conscriptive character. He made a number of observations, principally drawn from our history, to show that the militia were, and always would be, under proper officers, an effective force.

The question, on agreeing to this part of the report, was decided—for concurrence 64, against it 73, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. So the House refused to concur in extending the term of service from twelve to eighteen months.

The second proposition of the committee of conference is, that the House shall recede from an amendment, the object of which is to authorize the Executive, in case of neglect or refusal of the Governors of the States to execute the provisions of the law, to call directly on the militia officers of the States to carry them into effect.

On the question to agree to this proposition, an interesting debate of considerable length took place, in the course of which, it was advocated by Messrs. TROUP, STOCKTON, PICKERING, KING of Massachusetts, SHIPHERD, and WEBSTER; and opposed by Messrs. ROBERTSON, HAWKINS, FORSYTH, GHOLSON, CUTHBERT, and FISK of Vermont.

The discussion ended in the refusal of the House to agree to the proposition of the committee of conference by the following vote:—For agreeing to it 69, against it 80.

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Caperton, Cannon, Champion, Cilley, Clopton, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Ely, Farrow, Gaston, Geddes, Hale, Henderson, Howell, Hulbert, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Law, Lovett, Macon, Markell, McKee, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Moseley, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Ruggles, Schureman, Shelley, Sherwood, Shipherd, Slaymaker, Smith of New York, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Taggart, Taylor, Thompson, Troup, Vose, Ward

The House then agreed to the other propositions of the committee of conference; and,

On motion of Mr. TROUP, the House resolved to insist on the amendments from which it had just refused to recede; and a message was sent to the Senate to acquaint them of this determination.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America.

A motion was made by Mr. HALE to amend the bill, by striking out the thirteenth section of the bill, which authorizes occasional suspension of payments in specie by the bank: Whereupon,

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, required the previous question, which precludes all further debate or amendment of the bill. This call being duly sustained, the previous question was taken, and decided—for taking the main question 72, against taking it 70.

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Bines, Brown, Caldwell, Cannon, Chappell, Clark, Clendenin, Comstock, Conard, Creighton, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Evans, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Forney, Forsyth, Gholson, Gourd, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Irwin, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Leferts, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McLean, Moore, Murfree, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Sage, Seybert, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Williams, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Yancey.

The previous question having thus been decided in the affirmative—a motion was made to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

The CHAIR decided (Mr. MACON, in the absence of Mr. CHEVES, occupying the Chair) that the motion was not in order, inasmuch as the House having decided that the main question shall be now put, no other motion can obtain, unless a motion to adjourn.

An appeal was taken from this decision of the Chair; which, after some debate, was confirmed by yeas and nays, by the following vote: In favor of the Chair 108, against it 36.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, then took an appeal from the decision of the Chair. (Mr. MACON still occupying it,) that the main question was, that the bill should pass to a third reading. He contended that the main question was, that on the amendment under discussion when the previous question was called.

[The question has, more than once, been decided in the same manner by the present and late Speaker, and affirmed with much solemnity.]

After some debate, the decision of the Chair was affirmed by the following vote: In favor of the decision 91, against it 52.

The main question, viz: Shall the amendments be engrossed, and, together with the bill, be read a third time? was then put, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Bines, Bradley, Brown, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Chappell, Clark, Clendenin, Comstock, Conard, Creighton, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Duvall, Earle, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Gourdin, Griffin, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Irwin, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Leflerts, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McKee, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Sharp, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Tannhill, Taylor, Telfair, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Williams, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Yancey—81.

NAYS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Bowen, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Butler, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Clopton, Cooper, Cox, Crawford, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Desha, Ely, Evans, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Hale, Hall, Henderson, Humphreys, Jackson of Rhode Island, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lovett, Macon, Markell, Miller, Moseley, Newton, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sheffield, Sherwood, Shipherd, Slaymaker, Stanford, Stockton, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Winter—62.

So the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow; and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 28.

On motion of Mr. PICKENS, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making a change in the organization of the corps of artillery and engineers, which may allow the officers thereof to be placed on a more favorable footing in regard to promotion.

On motion of Mr. KILBOURN,
Resolved, That so much of the report of the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, made to this House on the 8th ultimo, and now lying upon the table, as relates to the "bill for the more effectual defence of the Northwestern frontier," be referred to a select committee, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. KILBOURN, Mr. MCKEE, Mr. CUTHBERT, Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. WILCOX, Mr. KENNEDY, and Mr. PARKER, were appointed the committee.

The bill from the Senate, "for the relief of John C. Hurlburt, of Chatham, in the State of Connecticut," was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Benjamin Wells, and others. The case of these persons is that of persons who suffered injury in their property and persons in the year 1794, and who pray remuneration therefor. The report was accompanied by a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending the authorizing of legal provision for the adjustment of their accounts. The report having been read—

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, reported a bill for the relief of Benjamin Wells and others; which was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America, was announced for its third reading.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means with instructions to report an amendment thereto, authorizing the twenty millions of dollars (therein directed to be paid in gold or silver coin, or in public stock created since the declaration of war) to be paid in gold or silver coin, or in any public debt contracted or to be contracted, which shall at the time of subscription bear an accruing interest of six per cent.

On suggestion of Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, Mr. GASTON included in his motion the following further instruction to the committee: "And that the said committee be also instructed to extend the time for opening subscriptions at New Orleans, Nashville, Lexington, and Chillicothe, (the time fixed in the bill being the third Monday in January)—and to strike out so much of the 18th fundamental rule as directs that all specie payments during the present war shall be made at Philadelphia."

The motion for the recommitment gave rise to a long and animated debate, in which Messrs. GASTON, OAKLEY, SHEFFEY, SHARP, MCKEE,

H. OF R.

KING of Massachusetts, and PICKERING, supported the motion; and Messrs. INGHAM, HOPKINS, FISK of Vermont, and FORSYTH, opposed it.

The debate turned principally on the question of the expediency of restricting the privilege of subscription to the bank to such stock of the United States, now in existence, as has been created since the war, and excluding all stock previously existing, and which may be hereafter created. Interwoven with this discussion, were some remarks on both sides, on the general question of establishing such a bank as that proposed by the bill, and particularly on the celerity with which the minority alleged it had been pushed through the House.

The recommitment was also advocated by one or two gentlemen friendly to the principle of the bill, on other grounds than that above stated; the principal of which was, a desire to extend the time for opening the subscriptions at distant places, for which it was argued that much too short a time was now allowed by the bill.

The question, on recommitment of the bill, was decided by yeas and nays—for recommitment 79, against it 76, as follows:

THURSDAY, December 29.

Mr. SEYBERT presented a petition of the representatives of the religious society of friends (Quakers) in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and parts adjacent, praying that members of their society may be exempt from military duty, and that the National Legislature will consent, by a solemn act, to the rights of conscience.—Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on various goods, wares, and merchandise, manufactured within the United States," with amendments. The Senate have also passed a bill "to provide for leasing certain lands reserved for the support of schools in the Mississippi Territory;" in which amendments and bill they ask the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also resolved that a committee of three members be appointed, who, jointly with such committee as the House of Representatives may appoint, shall be a committee to inquire into the expenses of stationery, printing, and binding, for both Houses of Congress, and into the expediency of establishing permanent rules for regulating and conducting the printing and binding, and for the supply of stationery for the Senate and House of Representatives; and Mr. DAGGETT, Mr. FROMENTIN, and Mr. MORROW, have been appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. ARCHER, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred for amendment the bill from the Senate to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America, reported three amendments thereto, in conformity to the instructions of the House.

The first amendment proposes to substitute the second Monday in February for the third Monday in January, as the day on which the books of subscription to the bank shall be opened.—Agreed to.

The second amendment proposes to strike out so much of the bill as describes the (war) stock which shall be subscribable to the bank, and in lieu thereof to insert "any public debt of the United States contracted, or to be contracted, which at the time of payment shall bear an accruing interest of six per centum per annum."

After a few words from Mr. GASTON and Mr. OAKLEY, expressive of a hope that this amendment would pass, and from Mr. INGHAM and Mr. DESHA to the contrary, the question on this amendment was decided without debate—For the amendment 72, against it 73, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Bowen, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Calhoun, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Clopton, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Ely, Gaston, Geddes, Glasgow, Hale, Henderson, Howell, Humphreys, Hulbert, Jackson of Rhode Island, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lovett, Macon, Markell, McKee, Miller, Montgomery, Moseley, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Ruggles, Schureman, Sharp, Sheffield, Sherwood, Shipperd, Slaymaker, Smith of New York, Stanford, Stockton, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Winter.

YAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Bines, Bradley, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Cannon, Chappell, Clendenin, Comstock, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duval, Evans, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Griffin, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irwin, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, Lefferts, Lyle, McCoy, McLean, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Ringgold, Robertson, Sage, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Troup, Udree, Williams, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Yancey.

So the House refused to accept this amendment.

The other amendment proposes to strike out that part of one of the fundamental rules which restricts the payment of the notes in specie to such as are presented at the principal bank.

The adoption of this amendment was opposed by Mr. ARCHER, Mr. FORSYTH, Mr. INGHAM, Mr. HAWKINS, and others, on the ground, generally, that the provision would not in fact be effectual, because it would be in the power of the bank, notwithstanding such provision, to issue notes payable at the principal bank; but, if it would be operative, its effect would be injurious in the highest degree, inasmuch as it would, in a very few days after the bank commenced operation, compel it to cease payment in specie, owing to its liability to pay it at so many points, and the great demand for specie now existing, and likely to continue during the war, to the end of which this proposition was limited.

The amendment was supported by Mr. SHARP, and Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, and others, on the ground, principally, that it would be infinitely better that the notes should bear on their face their actual value and place of payment, than that they should purport to be payable at places at which in fact they would not be payable in specie. If made payable at Philadelphia only, the persons receiving the paper would know its real value, and not under a deceptive aspect of being payable at any of the branches, where in fact no payment in specie was to be made, &c. It was also objected to the bill, as it now stands, that it would drain all the specie in the country to accumulate it at Philadelphia.

The question on the amendment resulted by yeas and nays—For the amendment 76, against it 75, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bard, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly, of Virginia, Bigelow, Bowen, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Butler, Caperton, Calhoun, Champion, Cilley, Clopton, Cooper, Cox, Crawford, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Desha, Earle, Ely, Farrow, Gaston, Geddes, Glasgow, Hale, Hall, Henderson, Howell, Humphreys, Hulbert, Jackson of Rhode Island, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Lovett, Lowndes, Markell, McKee, Miller, Moseley, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Barnett, Bines, Brown, Caldwell, Cannon, Chappell, Clendenin, Comstock, Conard, Creighton, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Duval, Evans, Findley, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Gourdin, Griffin, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Irwin, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Smith of Pennsylvania, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Williams, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Yancey.

The SPEAKER decided it in the affirmative by his casting vote.

Mr. FARROW then moved to amend the bill by striking out so much as describes the stock to be subscribable, and inserting in lieu thereof a provision limiting the privilege of subscription in the stock of the bank to such public debt as shall be hereafter contracted.

On this motion, Mr. FARROW addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, you have rejected the old revolutionary war stock, and on every principle of either consistency, policy, or honesty, you now ought to exclude the present war stock. You state that the stock that you have excluded was purchased up from the soldiery, who rendered the service at the rate of eight or ten dollars for one, and therefore the present holders have no equitable claim to come into the bank with their stock. The speculation on your soldiers was dishonest and dishonorable, indeed; and, what rendered it a little more infamous than ordinary, it extended from your Congress Hall. Yes, sir, some of your honorable members of that day were deeply engaged in it; they had their agents out purchasing up the indents, the soldier's claim; and, as soon as they purchased all that they could get, they then voted for the claims to be funded, which raised the stock immediately above par. Let us now leave this disgraceful transaction, after reminding you that it is a debt that you justly owe. And I will further remind you, that some of this stock is at this moment in the hands of those who fought your battles, and wear the scars of their bravery; some of it is in the hands of the widow, whose husband fell in your battle; some of it is held by the minor as a legacy from the ancestor. Those are the persons, among others, that you have shut the door of your bank against; with their demands, they cannot purchase the stock of your bank.

If you will now indulge me, I will examine what equitable claim those creditors have for whom alone you are about to establish this great institution. I believe them to be honest and honorable men. They have acted so with you. You wanted their money; they had a right to make the best bargain that they could obtain. They offered you eighty dollars for a hundred dollars of your stock; you took it. You stated to them the terms of payment, and the security that you would give them; they accepted of it. They have acted faithful (to themselves) over a few; you are now about to give them a bank, which will make them rulers over many. With this bank, I fear they will be able to govern the nation in their own way. Those creditors are entitled to strict justice from you, and nothing more. The true policy would be to reject this class of creditors as you have the other class who holds the old war stock, and only admit the stock of such debts as will accrue on subsequent loans. By this course, you can make your loans on better terms; you can obtain money at six per cent. In this way the advantage of the bank will be to the Government, in place of going to a few individuals who you are under no obligations to but to comply with the contract as made between you. I do insist that you ought to put all of your creditors on the same footing; either admit them all to come in, or keep them all out. I call on every honorable member, individually, to think for himself on the subject of this amendment. A man making himself acquainted with facts, and deliberately making up an opinion, will nine times out of ten determine on correct principles; but when he throws himself, soul and body, upon a party, he will nine times out of ten decide wrong, for it is but seldom that correct principles will answer party purposes. I do not know that the source from whence this plan came has been actuated from any but pure motives. I do not know who those stockholders are, nor where they are; but this I do know, that a more profitable project could not be planned, either by themselves or any other person in their favor, than what the bill on your table contemplates.

The principles of banking I am not acquainted with; and I find that this Hall is not a place to acquire any knowledge on the subject, for those who understand it best differ the most. I am in favor of a National Bank either in a time of peace or war. And if the bill before you cannot be altered for the better, Mr. Speaker, I am still not certain but what I will vote for it. I am not afraid that it will be altered for the worse. If I do vote for the bill in its present shape, I shall do so under the influence of a hope that it is possible it will afford some little relief to the Government. If you adopt the amendment that I have proposed, it will not then be such a bill as I would wish to see pass. I want the capital reduced; the specie capital raised; the sum to be loaned to the Government reduced; and that the bank should be compelled to pay specie for their bills whenever demanded. I want such a bank as will wear, at least, the complexion of a commercial bank on banking principles.

Mr. INGHAM and Mr. FORSYTH opposed and Mr. GASTON and Mr. OAKLEY supported the motion.

Mr. POTTER, of Rhode Island, said he wished the motion to prevail, which would give the benefit of the bank to the nation, instead of a few individuals. He said, if this was a question of ordinary legislation, that could be modified or repealed whenever it should be thought expedient by a future Congress, he would have been satisfied with giving a silent vote, that its friends might find out, from experience, what its opposers had predicted. But when he considered if this charter, in its present form, was granted, that it was out of the reach of the Legislature for twenty years, and was granting an exclusive right to a particular description of creditors, to make paper money for the same time, almost without restraint in amount, and entirely without responsibility, he could not let it pass without entering his protest against it.

He said he would not vote for such a charter, under any Administration, at any time, or under any circumstances; but if this must be granted, he wished the capital, as far as it was to consist of paper, to be made of new stock and Treasury notes, which would be of some benefit to the nation. He said much time had been consumed, the preceding as well as on the present day, in discussing and comparing the merits and tender mercies of the speculators, who purchased up the debt of the Revolution, with those who hold the present war stock. He said he believed, if one description of them had succeeded better than the other in their speculations, it was more owing to their skill and opportunity than to any other cause; their disposition to make the most of their money was the same.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. INGHAM,) being himself in favor of war-stock, thinks it strange that any other person should wish to include all the present and future stock, putting all the present creditors upon a par, and giving the nation the advantage in the sale of future stock, and says that the minority discouraged the loans for the purposes of the war, and predicted the fate of those who should loan their money to the Government for that purpose, and now wished to see their predictions verified. This, he said, was the reason of its depreciation.

Mr. P. said it was very easy to make those general charges against a party, even when they were without foundation; but, he said, it was not in the power of a minority to injure the credit of the Government, if they did their duty in fulfilling their engagements; but this they had not done. They had not provided ways and means to meet the exigencies of the Government; they had not collected from the people, in direct and internal taxes, since the war, but about five millions of dollars. Having neglected to provide ways and means to pay the interest, the principal must depreciate. Their political friends in New York and Pennsylvania had been the first to injure, and eventually to destroy the credit of bank paper; their friends in Boston the first to refuse to pay the draft of the Government with funds in their hands.

At the commencement of the war, public stock was at par, and the interest punctually paid; bank paper was in good credit generally until the collector of the port of New York, maliciously and without any justifiable cause, seized and stopped a large sum of money belonging to the banks in Boston, under pretence that it was about to be sent out of the country to the enemy, when he must have known better, as bills could have then been bought in New York for twenty per cent. discount; but as he was in office, and, as he understood, a director of the bank from whence some of this money was taken, he must exercise his power to discourage similar applications. This was the first check to the credit of bank paper. The next shock it received was in Pennsylvania, which eventually compelled the banks in that State and New York to stop payment. The Government of the United States being in great want of money to help to prosecute this war, the banks in Philadelphia were induced to loan them large sums in their bills, which were put in general circulation. The Legislature of Pennsylvania knowing the situation of those banks, and professing great friendship for the present Administration, after having sent in the annual pledges of life, fortune, and honor, to aid them in the prosecution of the war, granted forty bank charters, interesting a great portion of her citizens, in every part of the State, in them, who set about collecting the bills of those banks who had loaned their money to the Government, in order to get specie for the vaults of the new banks, in such sums that they were unable to meet all their bills, and immediately stopped payment. In this situation the directors of the banks had a meeting, and being desirous of being on good terms at the Treasury of the United States, and not willing to offend the State of Pennsylvania, on whom they depended for the renewal of their charters, instead of acknowledging that they had been imprudent in loaning so much of their money, or charging their misfortunes to the State, for granting so many bank charters at such a time, and being desirous of assigning some plausible reason to the public for the course they were about to pursue, in refusing to pay specie for their bills—in this situation, prevailed upon themselves to believe it to be patriotic to stop payment, pretending that the money was going out of the country, and stopped accordingly.

Mr. P. said he would next call their attention to their pretended friends in Boston. At this place, the Government owed about two hundred thousand dollars, for interest on its debt, and, in order to pay it, had placed in the State Bank in Boston, (owned and managed exclusively by the friends of Administration,) about six hundred thousand dollars, which the bank had received as a general deposit. The bank refused to pay, and the Government draft was dishonored, under a pretence that the deposit consisted of Treasury notes, and that, at some future day, the Government would owe them. If they had taken those notes in special deposit, they would have been accountable for those notes only; but as they had given credit for them generally, and had been benefitted by the interest, they could have no excuse for not paying the money, the more especially, as he had been credibly informed that the banks in Boston, in order to sustain the credit of the Government, and bank paper generally, and to enable this bank to fulfill its engagements, offered to loan them four hundred thousand dollars, which was refused. From this bank, he said, the Government had a right to expect better things, as he had frequently heard it observed, that, in case of war, the Government might reasonably expect a loan from its president alone of two millions of dollars, to aid them in the prosecution of the present war.

Mr. P. said he could trace the same system of depreciating the credit of the Government to the Treasury Department, in this city, in respect to Treasury notes. He said, while we had been endeavoring to hire money, making great sacrifices to pay those notes, he had understood they could not be received in taxes, unless the individual, paying his tax, had a note of about the same sum; that he could not pay his neighbor's taxes and his own to the amount of his note, and there were none issued in less sums than twenty dollars.

Mr. P. said he was aware that it would be said of the minority, on this question, as it had been on many others, that they opposed everything, either in principle or detail. Be it so. They never were consulted on any subject; they had no opportunity to originate any measure; nor had they even a choice of evils; and whenever any project of the majority failed, and did not answer their expectations, its failure is generally charged to the minority. He said he would ask the majority to review their own conduct, going no further back than the commencement of the last session, and see if they had any reason to believe that we should be in any better condition respecting our finances than we are. We were then together about five months. Knowing the nakedness of the Treasury, and the exposed and defenceless situation of the country, and that we were contracting immense debts, and that our expenses were enormous; knowing all this, they did not devise ways and means, by taxes, to get money to pay their own expenses; and, after talking about a land and whiskey tax, separated without laying either, satisfying themselves with the repeal of the non-importation law, thus humbling ourselves to Great Britain in the face of the world, by giving up a system that had done us much injury, (put on to coerce them,) for the purpose of getting their goods into this country; not because we wanted them, but because we wanted to derive a revenue from them in an indirect way, rather than disturb the people with taxes—thus giving the English an opportunity to fill our country with their merchandise, to the relief of their manufactures and to the destruction of our own, while they drew the specie out of the country in payment for them; and this we did merely for the privilege of collecting a duty upon them from our own people. But the English, seeing our situation, and seeing that this was a revenue more than a commercial project, they immediately extended their blockade, and turned our favorite system of coercion upon ourselves, by way of chastisement, having it in her power to let vessels under neutral flags pass in and out of such ports as she pleases.

Mr. P. said that the great and weighty matters that induced the President to call Congress to meet at an earlier day than that to which they stood adjourned, was nothing more than to provide against the defalcation in the revenue expected in consequence of the repeal of the non-importation law. He said he supposed Congress, having seen where they had neglected to provide ways and means, to meet the exigencies of the country, the last session, would have proceeded immediately to have laid a land and whiskey tax as high as was prudent, and to have extended the stamp tax as far as was practicable, without taxing all the manufactories in the United States, and every article used by the poor. This, he said, would have done much to revive public credit. Mr. P. said, if they had then issued Treasury notes, in small sums, bearing an interest of six per cent., with the privilege of funding them at eight per cent. in sums of five hundred dollars, and made them receivable for all taxes and debts due to the Government; if the friends of the Administration and the war, who are by far more numerous and wealthy than the people of the United States who achieved the independence of this country, had returned home, and instead of finding fault, and laying all the misfortunes of the country, occasioned by their own mismanagement, to the minority, (who have no power to do anything, and are never noticed but to be reviled, and never called upon but to suffer or to pay their money,) and if they had shown them faith by their works, and taken up those notes to the amount of four or five per cent. on their capital, and funded them, it would have shown to the people generally, that they had confidence in one another, and in the Government. Thereby they would have induced others to have done the same thing. Many people of the United States, who would be able and willing to take up these notes to the amount of many thousand dollars and fund them, were not able to loan twenty-five thousand dollars, the least sum that could be subscribed to the loan, and who would not be concerned with speculators to make up that sum. Thus the demand for those notes, for funding and for paying debts and taxes, would have been very great, and would have created a general demand for them. These notes would then have relieved the Government, and answered a tolerable purpose as a currency, at any rate much better than the bills of the contemplated bank.

Mr. P. said this course would have been very simple and easy; would have answered a good purpose for the Government and people, and would neither injure other institutions, nor furnish an object for speculation.

Mr. P. said that this amendment brought up the question fairly between the present war stock and future stock, and Treasury notes. He said he thought that new stock and Treasury notes would make much the best stock for a bank, the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. P. said, if this bank was to be made for the exclusive benefit of speculators in war stock, it ought to remain as it was; but if it was for the benefit of the nation, the amendment ought to prevail. He said, it would seem from the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the chairman of a committee, to whom the business was referred, that he is in favor of a war stock exclusively; but, when he attempts to assign his reasons for his judgment, it would seem that he had mistaken his side. Upon being asked if Treasury notes, to a considerable amount, could be got into circulation, his answer is in the negative, and he assigns for reason, that they will be bought up at the offices, and, by that means, prevented from going into circulation. Admit it to be so, if the Government gets the money for them, it serves to establish their credit, and if they are absorbed in the stock of this bank, it creates a demand for more of them, that will get into circulation in aid of the Government.

But, Mr. P. said, that a war-stock bank that could issue as much paper almost as they pleased, without being under any obligations to pay their bills, seemed to be a sine qua non with the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. P. said, whenever he thought of this bank, the names of certain speculators came into his mind at the same time, and when he asked why this bank was made exclusively for their benefit, without consulting the interest of the nation, or other stockholders, he was told that those who had loaned their money to Government to prosecute this war, were patriots, and ought to be preferred to other creditors. He said he should be glad to know what further claim those patriots have upon the Government whose credit they had depressed and taken advantage of. They took from us a war premium for a war risk. We owe them nothing; we never promised them a bank. They would not have returned any part of their exorbitant premium if the war had ceased.

In England, Mr. P. said, a public creditor does all he can to keep up the credit of the nation and its stocks, and, in doing this, he keeps up the value of his own stocks; but, in this country, it seems to be quite the reverse; it seems that our stock-jobbers and patriots, after making the best terms they could with our Treasury Department, induced them to agree, if they should be in greater distress, before they should procure all the money they wanted to hire, and any other person should take a greater advantage of them than they had, that they should make them an allowance to make up the difference, by which means those who first loaned their money, instead of having an interest in supporting the credit of the stocks, had an interest in depressing them. And he said he had understood that some of them had begun so soon to depreciate the price of stock in the market, to compel the Government to hire on less advantageous terms, and had done it so effectually, that they were unable to fulfil their own contracts.

H. OF R.

Bank of the United States.

DECEMBER, 1814.

Mr. P. said, he was opposed to this bank in its present form, because the Government lends its aid to induce the people to take its bills, without becoming themselves responsible for them, or without making any provision in the charter, to compel the bank to pay either principal or interest, or even to compel them to assign over the stock of the bank, if they would take it, on which they are receiving an interest from the Government, and because its capital is to be made of depreciated stock, and, he feared, managed by men in desperate circumstances and depreciated credit, who will have all the benefit of the bank, and the nation derives no advantages eventually from it. He said the people would be taxed to pay six per cent. interest for all the bills of this bank that the Government may hire of them, and when they shall have received them, having sold their property or rendered services for them, they can get neither principal nor interest, they therefore loan six per cent. more by holding them, besides the depreciation of them in their hands.

Mr. P. said, as soon as there should be paid into this bank about twelve millions of war stock, and something over one million of specie, it was to go into operation, and was obligated to loan to the Government thirty millions in its bills. He said such an amount of paper, of such a bank, put into circulation, if it should be possible, in addition to the present depreciated stock-bank paper, would effectually destroy the credit of the whole paper system, and stop its circulation.

Mr. P. said, it would appear from what had been said by the friends of this bill, that almost everything was to be expected from it; that it was to be a remedy for all the difficulties under which we labor; that it would infuse new life and vigor into the body politic. Its bills would answer as a circulating medium, revive the public credit, relieve the Government from its present embarrassments, and support the credit of bank paper generally. He said if he might be permitted to compare small things with great, when the reasons were the same, he should as soon expect a merchant who owned a large quantity of flour at Alexandria, that he could hardly sell at any price, owing to the quantity in market beyond the demand for it, to go to Baltimore and buy a quantity in the same situation, and take it to Alexandria in order to raise the price, and create a demand for that already there, as to attempt to raise the credit, and create a demand for bank paper already depreciated by the quantity in circulation, by increasing the quantity tenfold, and of an inferior quality.

Mr. P. said he was opposed to this bank, because a better substitute may be furnished for a circulating medium in Treasury notes, more honorable to the Government, and more safe to this people, as there was no person, he believed, but what would rather have a Treasury note on interest, having the faith of the Government pledged with the taxes, all the real and personal property of the United States for their payment, than the bills of such a bank, having no foundation.—

Without the aid of Government in making them receivable for debts and taxes due them, they would, he believed, hardly pass for enough to pay for their printing.

Mr. P. said he had heard much about the credit of bank paper, and it would seem that many thought there was a kind of magic in it; but he said that as soon as some of the banks refused to pay specie for their bills, and it was known that they were not the honest representatives of specie, they soon lost all their charms. And that they were now distrusted and suspected by all classes, no person could deny; until the refusal of those banks they had a general credit, and the public had confidence in them, and it was for the interest of all banks and all persons interested in them to keep up the credit of bank paper, until by the imprudence of some of them all became suspected, many lost their credit, and some nearly ruined.

Mr. P. said much had been said about the bank capital in this country, it was now said we had one hundred millions, and he supposed as soon as this charter should be granted, we should have fifty millions more, when no person he believed would pretend that we had more than fifteen millions of dollars in specie in the United States. Mr. P. said this nominal bank capital consisted of stockholders' notes, many of whom have always owed the bank the amount of their stock, and some of them much more, and that part actually paid in by those who had money, and had no use for it, has been loaned out by the bank; so that all this capital, at this time, consists of debts due to the bank from stockholders who never calculated to pay, and from others who have as much as they can do to pay the interest of their debts and their taxes. The Government, therefore, cannot derive much aid from this kind of capital.

Mr. P. said it was now very clearly ascertained, that our wealth and strength, for the purposes of offensive war, had been very much overrated by both parties. It was said by those in power, if we were unanimous in our measures, it would have a very great effect in putting an end to the war. This, he said, would appear well on paper, but it would not add a dollar to the wealth of the nation. It is frequently said by some of the minority, that we would do much better if we had a mixed instead of a party Administration. This, Mr. P. said would only increase our difficulties. The Administration ought not to admit a person in the Opposition into the Cabinet, and such a person ought not to accept an appointment, if he had the offer of it. Many suppose if we had an entire change of Administration, and had a national, instead of a party war, all would soon be well. Mr. P., said that such an Administration he believed could do much to get the nation out of this war, by making a speedy and honorable peace. As they had no hand in making the war, they would not have to justify all the measures that led to it; but as to prosecuting the war in the present situation of the country, he believed they would do very little better than the present Administration. They would not make men or money; the fault had been in going to war unprepared after our revenue had been destroyed, and the spirit of the nation broken down, without taking early means to supply the Treasury and support the credit of the nation, which was now too far gone to be revived, by the paper of such a bank as the one proposed.

Mr. P. said, as the House were very anxious to decide this question, and the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. HOPKINS) had said the subject was perfectly well understood—as he knew but little about it himself, he should give them no further trouble, although, he said, he considered it a question of very great importance, as when this charter was granted, it would be granting an exclusive privilege to a few people, for twenty years. He therefore thought it a question that ought to be maturely considered and well understood. If then we have doubts as to the expediency of the measure, and of its answering the expected purpose in relieving the Government from its present embarrassments, he thought we ought to pause before we pass it. He said if the war lasted it would ruin many, who might take its bills, and if we had peace soon such a bank with such a capital, would be a dangerous political machine. Its stockholders and its debtors would make a numerous and powerful combination with those who may wish favors. He said, he believed, that such a bank, even in time of peace, when it would be in the hands of the real moneyed men of the nation, would have much influence in making Presidents, in supporting armies, and in controlling the future political destinies of this country.

He said it ought to be with a nation, as with an individual, who was surrounded with difficulties on all sides; when about to make a great effort to extricate himself (the failure of which would be likely to involve him in great difficulties, and perhaps ruin) he ought to be certain as to the correctness of the course he was about to pursue, that the object in view was attainable, with the means he was about to employ, and that, if successful, it would afford him the expected relief. If not, he ought to reflect, to pause, and to wait events.

The question on Mr. FARROW's motion was decided in the negative—yeas 65, nays 89, as follows:

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, then proposed a further amendment to the bill, viz: to strike out the word "fifty," so as to leave the amount of the capital blank.

The previous question having been thereupon demanded by Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, and supported by a sufficient number, viz: 75 for it, 67 against it—

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion was negatived, by yeas and nays—For the motion 56, against it 93, as follows:

Another motion was then made to adjourn, and negatived.

The previous question was then put in the usual form—"Shall the main question be now put?" and decided in the affirmative—For putting the main question 83, against it 63, as follows:

The question on ordering the bill to a third reading was then decided in the affirmative without a division.

On the question when the bill should be read a third time, to-morrow and to-day were named. The question being taken on to-morrow, there were for to-morrow 57, against it 76.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time to-day.

A motion was then made to adjourn, and negatived by a vote of 75 to 60.

The bill was then announced for a third reading.

Mr. BIGELOW raised a question of order, whether it was proper to read the bill a third time before the other orders of the day were disposed of. The SPEAKER having decided that bills on their third readings had preference in the order of the day, Mr. B. appealed from the decision of the Speaker, (Mr. MACON,) which was affirmed by the House.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, moved to recommit the bill with certain instructions, substantially as follows:

1. To reduce the capital to twenty-five millions of dollars, with liberty to the Government to subscribe five millions additional at any future time.

2. To strike out the provision allowing the bank to cease specie payment.

3. To strike out so much of the bill as makes it obligatory on the bank to lend money to the Government.

4. To introduce a provision, that if the bank shall not commence operations within — months after the passage of the act, the charter shall be forfeited.

5. To allow an interest of — per cent. per annum on any note, payment of which shall have been demanded of the bank, and refused.

6. To provide that of the twenty-five millions, five shall be payable in specie, and twenty in any United States six per cent. stock, or in Treasury notes.

7. To strike out that provision which restrains the bank from selling its stock.

Mr. W. supported his motion by a number of remarks, the general purport of which was, that he had resorted to this method to show to the world what sort of a bank he and his friends were willing to support.

Mr. GASTON followed in a short speech of much vehemence in favor of this motion, and with the zeal he has uniformly exhibited on this subject in opposition to the bill.

Mr. WILLIAM REED, of Massachusetts, next took the floor in decided opposition to this bill, of which he expressed the utmost abhorrence, and the greatest dread of its effects.

After the rejection of several motions to adjourn—

Mr. BIGELOW made a speech on the same side of the question as the two gentlemen who had preceded him in debate.

Before Mr. B. finished his speech, however, a motion to adjourn prevailed; and the House adjourned at 7 o'clock in the evening.

FRIDAY, December 30.

On motion of Mr. HALL,

Resolved, That the committee to whom was referred the letter from the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, be directed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for settling the claims of persons to public lands in the Mississippi Territory, derived from the purchase of certain companies under an act, or pretended act, of the State of Georgia, passed on the 7th day of January, 1795, whose claims have not been recorded in the office of the Department of State, agreeably to the provisions of the eighth section of an act of Congress, passed on the 3d day of March, 1803.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. JENNINGS, and was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Executive authorities of the several States and Territories of the United States, respectively, by law, to apprehend, secure, and deliver to the Governor, for the time being, of any Territory of the United States, or his agent, any fugitive or fugitives from justice, upon demand being made of the Executive authority of any such State or Territory, to which such fugitive or fugitives shall have fled, and upon producing an indictment found, or an affidavit made before a competent officer, charging the person so demanded with having committed treason, felony, or other crime, within the jurisdiction of the said Territory, from which he so fled, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

H. OF R.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America; and the motion to recommit the bill with instructions being again stated, the bill was, on motion of Mr. PLEASANTS, ordered to lie on the table.

A message was received from the Senate announcing the death of RICHARD BRENT, a Senator of the United States from Virginia.

A motion was then made by Mr. FISK, of New York, that the House do again proceed to the consideration of the bank bill; which motion was decided in the affirmative by the following vote: For the motion 81, against it 70.

Mr. PICKERING commenced a speech in favor of recommitment, and in opposition to the bill; when, on motion of Mr. PLEASANTS, the bill was again ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the committee of the Senate appointed to make arrangements for the burial of Mr. BRENT, announcing their determination to attend the funeral at 12 o'clock to-morrow; which letter having been read—

On motion of Mr. PLEASANTS,

Resolved, unanimously, That the House will attend the funeral of RICHARD BRENT, Esq., late a member of the Senate of the United States.

Resolved, unanimously, That this House will wear mourning on the left arm for the space of one month, in testimony of their respect for the memory of the deceased.

The House then immediately adjourned.

SATURDAY, December 31.

No business was transacted in the House this day, in consequence of the funeral of Mr. BRENT, of the Senate.

MONDAY, January 2, 1815.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, on horses kept exclusively for the saddle or carriage, and on gold and silver watches," with amendments; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. McKEE, of Kentucky, from the Committee of Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of the inhabitants of the late county of New Madrid, in the Missouri Territory, who have suffered by earthquakes; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, laid before the House, on behalf of the committee of investigation, a letter from the late Secretary of the Treasury, on subjects connected with the capture of Washington by the enemy in August last; which was ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the acting Secretary of the Navy, on the memorial of Uriah Brown, respecting his invention for projecting liquid fire as a means of military or naval annoyance. The report is favorable to the utility and practicability of the invention; and was referred to a select committee.

The resolution from the Senate for appointing a joint committee to inquire into the propriety of adopting fixed rules for conducting in future the printing, stationery, and binding, for both Houses of Congress, was taken up, read three times and concurred in.

The bill from the Senate authorizing the leasing of public lands, reserved for the use of schools, was twice read, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill laying duties on certain manufactures, were taken up. [The changes of duties proposed by the Senate in this bill, are principally to strike out pig iron and spermaceti candles, and to add umbrellas. There are other amendments to the detail of the bill.] The amendments were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America. Mr. WEBSTER's motion to recommit the bill being still under consideration.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, however the House may dispose of the motion before it, I do not regret that it has been made. One object intended by it at least, is accomplished. It presents a choice to the House, and it shows, that the opposition which exists to the bill in its present shape, is not an undistinguishing hostility to whatever may be proposed as a National Bank, but a hostility to an institution of such a useless and dangerous nature, as it is believed the existing provisions of the bill would establish.

If the bill should be recommitted and amended according to the instructions which I have moved, its principles will be materially changed. The capital of the proposed bank will be reduced from fifty to thirty millions; and composed of specie and stocks, in nearly the same proportion as the capital of the former Bank of the United States. The obligation to lend thirty millions of dollars to Government, an obligation which cannot be performed without committing an act of bankruptcy, will be struck out. The power to suspend the payment of its notes and bills will be abolished, and the prompt and faithful execution of its contract secured, as far as, from the nature of things, it can be secured. The restriction on the sale of its stocks will be removed, and, as it is a monopoly, provision will be made, that if it should not commence its operations in reasonable time, the grant shall be forfeited. Thus amended, the bill would establish an institution, not unlike the late Bank of the United States, in any particular which I deem material, excepting only the increased amount of the capital.

To a bank of this nature, I should at any time be willing to give my support, not as a measure of temporary policy, or an expedient to find means of relief from the present poverty of the Treasury; but as an institution of permanent interest and importance, useful to the Government and country at all times, and most useful in times of commerce and prosperity.

I am sure, sir, that the advantages which would at present result from any bank, are greatly overrated. To look to a bank, as a source capable not only of affording a circulating medium to the country but also of supplying the ways and means of carrying on the war, especially at a time when the country is without commerce, is to expect much more than will ever be obtained. Such high wrought hopes can end only in disappointment. The means of supporting an expensive war are not of quite so easy acquisition. Banks are not revenues. They cannot supply its place. They may afford facilities to its collection and distribution. They may furnish, with convenience, temporary loans to Government, in anticipation of its taxes, and render important assistance in divers ways to the general operations of finance. They are useful to the State, in their proper place and sphere; but they are not the sources of national income.

The fountains of revenue must be sunk deeper. The credit and circulation of bank paper are the effects, rather than the cause, of a profitable commerce and a well ordered system of finance. They are the proofs of national wealth and prosperity, not the foundations of them. Whoever shall attempt to restore the fallen credit of this country by the creating of new banks, merely that they may create new paper, and that Government may have a chance of borrowing, where it has not borrowed before, will find himself miserably deceived. It is under the influence of no such vain hopes, that I yield my assent to the establishment of a bank on safe and proper principles. The principal good I expect from it is rather future than present. I do not see, indeed, that it is likely to produce evil at any time. In times to come it will, I hope, be useful.

If it were only to be harmless, there would be sufficient reason why it should be supported, in preference to such a contrivance as is now in contemplation.

The bank, which will be created by the bill, if it should pass in its present form, is of a most extraordinary, and, as I think, alarming nature. Its capital is to be fifty million of dollars, five millions in gold and silver, twenty millions in the public debt, created since the war, ten millions in Treasury notes, and fifteen millions to be subscribed by Government in stock, to be created for that purpose. The ten millions in Treasury notes, when received in payment of subscriptions to the bank, are to be funded also into the United States stocks. The stocks subscribed by Government on its own account, and those in which the Treasury notes are to be funded, to be redeemable only at the pleasure of Government. The war stock will be redeemable according to the terms upon which the late loans have been negotiated.

The capital of the bank, then, will be five millions of specie, and forty-five millions of Government stocks. In other words, the bank will possess five millions of dollars, and the Government will owe it forty-five millions. This debt from Government, the bank is restrained from selling during the war, and Government is excused from paying until it shall see fit. The bank is also to be under obligation to loan Government thirty millions of dollars, on demand, to be repaid, not when the convenience or necessity of the bank may require, but when other debts due the bank from Government are paid; that is, when it shall be the good pleasure of Government. This sum of thirty millions is to supply the necessities of the Treasury, and supersede the occasion of other loans. This loan will doubtless be made on the first day of the existence of the bank, because the public wants can admit of no delay. Its condition then will be, that it has five millions of specie, if it has been able to obtain so much, and a debt of seventy-five millions, no part of which it can either sell or call in, due to it from Government.

The loan of thirty millions to Government can only be made by an immediate issue of bills to that amount. If these bills should return, the bank will not be able to pay them. This is certain; and to remedy this inconvenience, power is given to the directors, by the act, to suspend, at their own discretion, the payment of their notes, until the President of the United States shall otherwise order. The President will give no such order, because the necessities of Government will compel it to draw on the bank, till the bank becomes as necessitous as itself. Indeed, whatever orders may be either given or withheld, it will be utterly impossible for the bank to pay its notes. No such thing is expected of it. The first note it issues will be dishonored on its return, and yet it will continue to pour out its paper, so long as Government can apply it in any degree to its purposes.

What sort of an institution, sir, is this? It looks less like a bank than like a department of Government. It will be properly the paper money department. Its capital is Government debts; the amount of issues will depend on Government necessities; Government in effect absolves itself from its own debts to the bank, and by way of compensation, absolves the bank from its own contracts with others. This is, indeed, a wonderful scheme of finance. The Government is to grow rich, because it is to borrow, without the obligation of repaying, and is to borrow of a bank which issues paper without liability to redeem it. If this bank, like other institutions, which dull and plodding common sense has erected, were to pay its debts, it must have some limits to its issues of paper, and therefore there would be a point beyond which it could not make loans to Government. This would fall short of the wishes of the contrivers of this system. They provide for an unlimited issue of paper, in an entire exemption from payment. They found their bank, in the first place, on the discredit of Government; and then hope to enrich Government out of the insolvency of the bank. With them, poverty itself is the main source of supply, and bankruptcy a mine of inexhaustible treasure. They rely, not on the ability of the bank, but on its beggary; not on gold and silver collected in its vaults to pay its debts and fulfil its promises, but on the locks and bars provided by statute to fasten its doors against the solicitations and clamors of importunate creditors. Such an institution, they flatter themselves, will not only be able to sustain itself, but to buoy up the sinking credit of Government. A bank which does not pay, is to guarantee the engagements of a Government which does not pay. "John Doe is to become security for Richard Roe." Thus the empty vaults of the Treasury are to be filled from the equally empty vaults of the bank, and the ingenious invention of a partnership between insolvents is to restore and re-establish the credit of both.

Sir, I can view this only as a system of rank speculation, and enormous mischief. Nothing in our condition is worse, in my opinion, than the inclination of Government to throw itself upon such desperate courses. If we are to be saved, it is not to be by such means. If public credit is to be restored, this is not one of the measures that will help to restore it. If the Treasury is exhausted, this bank will not fill it with anything valuable. If a safe circulating medium be wanted for the community, it will not be found in the paper of such a corporation.

I wish, sir, that those who imagine that these objects, or any of them, will be effected by such a bank as this, would describe the manner in which they expect it to be done. What is the process which is to produce these results? If it is perceived, it can be described. The bank will not operate either by miracle or magic. Whoever expects any good from it, ought to be able to tell us in what way that good is to be produced. As yet we have had nothing but general ideas, and vague and loose expressions. An indefinite and indistinct notion is entertained, nobody here seems to know on what ground, that this bank is to reanimate public credit, fill the Treasury, and remove all the evils which have arisen from the depreciation of the paper of existing banks.

Some gentlemen, who do not profess themselves to be in all respects pleased with the provisions of the bill, seem to content themselves with an idea that nothing better can be obtained, and that it is necessary to do something.

A strong impression that something must be done, is the origin of many bad measures. It is easy, sir, to do something; but the object is to do something useful. It is better to do nothing, than to do mischief. It is much better, in my opinion, to make no bank, than to pass the bill as it now is.

The interests to be affected by this measure, the finances, the public credit, and the circulating medium of the country, are too important to be hazarded on schemes like this. If we wish to restore the public credit, and to re-establish the finances, we have the beaten road before us. All true analogy, all experience, all just knowledge of ourselves and our condition point one way. We can hardly mistake it, without wilful blindness. A wise and systematic economy, and a settled and substantial revenue are the means to be relied on; not excessive issues of bank notes, a forced circulation, and all the miserable contrivances to which political folly can resort, with the idle expectation of giving to mere paper the quality of money.

These are all inventions of a short-sighted policy, vexed and goaded by the necessities of the moment, and thinking less of a permanent remedy, than of shifts and expedients to avoid the present distress. They have been a thousand times exploded, as delusive and ruinous, as destructive of all solid revenue, and incompatible with the security of private property.

It is, sir, sufficiently obvious, that to produce any benefit, this bank must be so constituted as that its notes shall have credit with the public. The first inquiry, therefore, should be, whether the bills of a bank of this kind will not be immediately and greatly depreciated. I think they will. It would be wonderful if they should not. This effect will not be produced by that excessive issue of its paper, which the bank must make in its loan to Government. Whether its issues of paper are excessive, will depend, not on the nominal amount of its capital, but on its ability to redeem. This is the only safe criterion. Very special cases may perhaps furnish exceptions, but there is in general no security for the credit of paper, but the ability in those who emit to redeem it. Whenever bank notes are not convertible into gold or silver at the will of the holder, they become of less value than gold and silver. All experiments on this subject have come to the same result. It is so clear, and has been so universally admitted, that it would be waste of time to dwell upon it. The depreciation may not be sensibly perceived the first day or the first week it takes place. It will first be discerned in what is called the rise of specie; it will next be seen in the increased price of all commodities.

The circulating medium of a commercial community must be that which is also the circulating medium of other commercial communities, or must be capable of being converted into that medium without loss. It must be able, not only to pass in payments and receipts between individuals of the same society or nation, but to adjust and discharge the balance of exchanges between different nations. It must be something which has a value abroad, as well as at home, and by which foreign as well as domestic debts can be satisfied. The precious metals alone answer these purposes. They alone, therefore, are money, and whatever else is to perform the offices of money must be their representative, and capable of being turned into them at will. So long as bank paper retains this quality, it is a substitute for money; divested of this, nothing can give it that character.

No solidity of funds, no sufficiency of assets, no confidence in the solvency of banking institutions has ever enabled them to keep up their paper to the value of gold and silver, any longer than they paid gold and silver for it on demand. This will continue to be the case so long as those metals shall continue to be the standard of value and the general circulating medium among nations.

Bank of the United States.

JANUARY, 1815.

A striking illustration of this common principle is found in the early history of the Bank of England. In the year 1797, it had been soliberal in its loans, that it was compelled to suspend the payment of its notes. Its paper immediately fell to a discount of near twenty per cent. Yet such was the public opinion of the solidity of its funds, that its stock then sold for one hundred and ten per cent., although no more than sixty per cent. upon the subscriptions had been paid in.

The same fate, as is well known, attended the paper of the banks of Scotland, when they adopted the practice of inserting in their notes a clause, giving the banks an option of paying their notes on demand, or in six months after demand, with interest. Paper of this sort was not convertible into specie at the pleasure of the holder; and no conviction of the ability of the bank which issued it, could preserve it from depreciation.

The suspension of specie payments by the Bank of England in 1797, and the consequences which followed, afford no argument to overturn this general experience. If Bank of England notes were not immediately depreciated on that occasion, depreciation nevertheless did ensue. Very favorable causes existed to prevent their sudden depression. It was an old and rich institution. It was known to be under the most discreet and independent management. Government had no control over it, to force it to make loans against its interest or its will. On the contrary, it compelled the Government to pay, though with much inconvenience to itself, a very considerable sum which was due to it. The country enjoyed at that time an extensive commerce, and a revenue of three hundred millions of dollars was collected and distributed through the bank. Under all these advantages, however, the difference of price between bank notes and coin became so great as to threaten at one time the most dangerous consequences.

Suppose the condition of England to have been reversed. Suppose, that instead of a prosperous and increasing commerce, she had suffered the ruin of her trade; and that the product of her manufactures had lain upon her hands, as the product of our agriculture now perishes on ours. Does any one imagine that her circulating paper could have existed, and maintained any credit in such a change of her condition? What ought to surprise us is, not that her bank paper was depreciated, but that it was not depreciated sooner and lower than in fact it was. The reason can only be found in that extraordinary combination of favorable circumstances which never existed before, and is hardly to be expected again. Much less is it to be discovered in our condition at present.

But we have experience nearer home. The paper of all the banks south of New England has become depreciated to an alarming extent. This cannot be denied. All that is said of the existence of this depreciation only at places remote from the banks, is unfounded and idle. It exists everywhere, even at the very doors of the banks themselves. The rates of exchange, both foreign and domestic, put this point beyond controversy. If a bill of exchange on Europe can be purchased, as it may, twenty per cent. cheaper in Boston than in Baltimore, the reason must be, that it is paid for in Boston in money, and in Baltimore in something twenty per cent. less value than money.

Notwithstanding this depression of their paper, it is not probable that any general doubt is entertained of the sufficiency of the funds of the principal banks. Certainly no such doubt is the cause of the fall of their paper; because the depression of the paper of all the banks in any place, as far as I learn, is generally uniform and equal; whereas, if public opinion proceeded at all, upon the adequacy or inadequacy of their funds, it would necessarily come to different results, in different cases, as some of these institutions must be supposed to be richer than others.

Sir, something must be discovered, which has hitherto escaped the observation of mankind, before you can give paper, intended for circulation, the value of a metallic currency, any longer than it represents that currency, and is convertible into it, at the will of the holder.

The paper then, of this bank, if you make it, will be depreciated for the same reason that the paper of other banks which have gone before it, and of those which now exist around us, has been depreciated: because it is not to pay specie for its notes.

Other institutions, setting out perhaps on honest principles, have fallen into discredit through mismanagement or misfortune. But this bank is to begin with insolvency. It is to issue its bills to the amount of thirty millions at least, when everybody knows it cannot pay them. It is to commence its existence in dishonor. It is to draw its first breath in disgrace. The promise contained in the first note it sends forth, is to be a false promise and whoever receives the note, is to take it with the knowledge that it will not be paid, according to the terms of it.

But this, sir, is not all. The framers of this bill have not done their work by halves. They have put the depreciation of the notes of their bank beyond all doubt or uncertainty, by the manner in which the capital is constituted. They have made assurance doubly sure. In addition to excessive issue of paper, and the failure to make payments, both which they provide for by law, they make the capital of the bank to consist principally of public stock.

If this stock could be sold as in the former Bank of the United States, the evil would be less. But the bank has not the power to sell it, and for all purposes of enabling it to fulfil its engagements, its funds might as well be at the bottom of the ocean, as in Government stocks, of which it cannot enforce payment, and of which it cannot dispose.

The credit of this institution is to be founded on public funds, not on private property or commercial credit. It is to be a financial, not a commercial bank. Its credit, therefore, can hardly be better at any time, than the credit of the Government. If the stocks be depreciated, so of course must everything be which rests on the stocks.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

It would require extraordinary ingenuity to show how a bank which is founded on the public debt, is to have any better reputation than the debt itself. It must be some very novel invention which makes the superstructure keep its place after the foundation has fallen. The argument seems to stand thus. The public funds, it is admitted, have little credit; the bank will have no credit which it does not borrow of the funds; but the bank will be in full credit.

If, sir, we were in a temper to learn wisdom from experience, the history of most of the banks on the continent of Europe might teach us the futility of all these contrivances. Those are, like this before us, established for purposes of finance, not purposes of commerce. The same fortune has happened to them all. Their credit has sunk. Their respective Governments go to them for money, when they can get it nowhere else; and the banks can relieve their wants only by new issues of their own paper. As this is not redeemed, the invariable consequence of depreciation follows; and this has sometimes led to the miserable and destructive expedient of a depreciation of the coin itself.

Such are the banks of Petersburg, Copenhagen, Vienna, and other cities of Europe. And while the paper of these Government banks has been thus depressed, that of other banks, existing in their near neighborhood, unconnected with Government, and conducting their business on the basis of commercial credit, has retained a value equivalent to that of coin.

Excessive issues of paper, and a close connexion with Government, are the two circumstances, which of all others are most certain to destroy the credit of bank paper. If there were no excessive issue, or in other words, if the bank paid its notes in specie on demand, its connexion with Government, and its interest in the funds, would not perhaps materially affect the circulation of its paper, although they would naturally diminish the value of its stock. But when these two circumstances exist in the condition of any bank; that it does not pay its notes, and that its funds are in public stocks, and all its operations intimately blended with the operations of Government, nothing further need be known, to be quite sure that its paper will not answer the purpose of a creditable circulating medium.

I look upon it, therefore, sir, as certain that a very considerable discount will attach itself to the notes of this bank, the first day of their appearance; that this discount will continue to increase, and unless Congress should be able to furnish some remedy, which is not certain, the paper in the end will be worth nothing. If this happens, not only will no one of the benefits proposed be obtained, but evils of the most alarming magnitude will follow. All the horrors of a paper money system are before us. If we venture on the present expedient, we shall hardly be able to avoid them. The ruin of public affairs and the wreck of private property will ensue.

I would ask, sir, whether the friends of this measure have well considered what effect it will produce on the revenue of the country? By the provisions of this bill, the notes of the bank are to be received in payment of all taxes and other dues to Government. They cannot be refused on account of the depreciation of their value. Government binds itself to receive them at par; although it should be obliged to pay them out immediately at a discount of a hundred per cent. It is certain, then, that a loss on the revenue will be sustained, equal to any depreciation which may take place in this paper; and when the paper shall come to nothing, the revenue of the country will come to nothing along with it. This has happened to other countries, where this wretched system has been adopted, and it will happen here.

The Austrian Government resorted to a similar experiment, in a very critical period of its affairs, in 1809, the year of the last campaign between that country and France, previous to the late coalition. Pressed by the necessities of the occasion, the Government caused a large quantity of paper to be issued, which was to be received in imposts and taxes. The paper immediately fell to a depreciation of four for one. The consequence was, that the Government lost its revenue, and with it the means of supplying its armies, and defending its Empire.

Is this Government, sir, now ready to put its resources all at hazard, by pursuing a similar course? Is it ready to sacrifice its whole substantial revenue, and permanent supplies, to an ill contrived, ill considered, dangerous and ruinous project, adopted only as the means of obtaining a little present and momentary relief?

It ought to be considered also, what effects this bank will produce on other banking institutions already existing, and on the paper which they have issued. The aggregate capital of these institutions is large. The amount of their notes is large, and these notes constitute at present, in a great portion of the country, the only circulating medium, if they can be called a circulating medium. Whatever affects this paper, either to raise it, or to depress it lower than it is, affects the interest of every man in the community.

It is sufficient, on this point to refer to the memorial from the banks of New York. That assures us that it must be the operation of such a bank as this bill would establish, to increase the difficulties and distress which the existing banks now experience, and to render it nearly impossible for them to resume the payment of their notes. This is what every man would naturally expect. Paper already depreciated will necessarily be sunk still lower when another flood of depreciated paper is forced into circulation.

Very recently, sir, this Government refused to extend the charter of the Bank of the United States, upon the ground that it was unconstitutional for Congress to create banks. Many of the State banks owe their existence to this decision. It was an invitation to the States to incorporate as much banking capital as would answer all the purposes of the country. Notwithstanding whatever we may now see and hear, it would then have been deemed a gross imputation on the consistency of Government if any man had expressed an expectation that in five years all these Constitutional scruples would be forgotten, all the danger to political liberty from moneyed institutions disregarded, and a bank proposed upon the most extraordinary principles, with an unprecedented amount of capital, and with no obligation to fulfil its contracts.

The State Banks have not forced themselves in the way of Government. They were established, many of them at least, when Government had declared its purpose to have no bank of its own. They deserve some regard on their own account, and on account of those particularly concerned in them; but they deserve much more consideration on account of the quantity of their paper which is in circulation, and the interest which the whole community has in it.

Let it be recollected, also, sir, that the present condition of the banks is principally owing to their advances to Government. The Treasury has borrowed of the banks, or of those who themselves borrowed of the banks, till the banks have become as poor, and almost as much discredited, as the Treasury itself. They have depreciated their paper, nearly ruined themselves, and brought the sorrest distress on the country by doing that on a small scale, which this new bank is to perform on a scale vastly larger.

It is almost unpardonable in the conductors of these institutions not to have foreseen the consequences which have resulted from the course pursued by them. They were all plain and visible. If they have any apology, it is that they were no blinder than the Government, and that they yielded to those, who would take no denial. It will be altogether unpardonable in us, if with this, as well as all other experience before us, we continue to pursue a system which must inevitably lead us, through depreciation of currency, paper money, tender laws, and all the contemptible and miserable contrivances of disordered finance and national insolvency, to complete and entire bankruptcy in the end.

I hope the House will recommit the bill for amendment.

When Mr. WEBSTER had concluded, the motion for recommitment was supported by Messrs. PICKERING, SHEPHERD, and WHEATON, in speeches of considerable length, and opposed by Messrs. FORSYTH and RHEA.

The question on recommitment was at length decided in the negative by yeas and nays—yeas 68, nays 89, as follows:

Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Bowen, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Butler, Caperton, Calhoun, Champion, Cilley, Clopton, Cooper, Cox, Crawford, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Ely, Evans, Farrow, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Henderson, Howell, Humphreys, Hulbert, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, McKee, Miller, Moseley, Markell, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Ruggles, Schureman, Shelley, Sherwood, Shipperd, Slaymaker, Smith of New York, Stan-

The bill was then read through, in the usual manner.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, spoke a short time in explanation of the motives which would govern his vote in this case.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, for the purpose of introducing a motion in aid of the rule, to prevent those members interested in the question from voting, moved to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was predicated on the fact that one member of the House (and perhaps others might be) was the proprietor of certain of the public stock, which is allowed to be paid in, in part, on account of shares to be subscribed to the bank.

This motion was opposed by Mr. FISK, of New York, and Mr. FINDLEY, of Pennsylvania; by whom it was contended that the rule of the House in this respect was sufficiently operative without this aid. It was supported by the mover, and by Mr. WARD, and Mr. FARROW.

The question on laying the bill on the table, was decided by yeas and nays—for laying the bill on the table 58, against it 104, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. The question was then taken on the passage of the bill. The yeas and nays thereon stood—yeas 81, nays 80, as follows:

The state of the vote having been declared—

The SPEAKER (Mr. CHEVES, of South Carolina,) rose. After adverting to the rule of the House, which makes it the right and duty of the Speaker to vote in two cases, of which this was one, he proceeded to assign briefly the reasons which influenced him to vote against the bill. He noticed the opinions expressed on both sides of the House for and against the measure; and declared his own conviction that the bill proposed a dangerous, unexampled, and, he might almost say, a desperate resort. He cursorily examined the three views in which the passage of the bill had been advocated, namely, as calculated to resuscitate public credit; to establish a circulating medium; and to afford the ways and means for the support of the Government. He delivered, with even more than his usual eloquence and impressiveness, his opinions of these several points, and concluded with expressing his solemn belief, that neither of these purposes would be answered by the bill. He denied that the passage of this bill was demanded by the safety of the nation; but intimated his opinion that a National Bank bill might be framed, by which the avowed objects of the present bill might be accomplished, which he had no doubt would unite a majority in its favor. Although the vote was painful to him to give, he was therefore obliged to vote in the negative.

The SPEAKER's vote having produced an equality of votes, he declared the decision of the House to be, that the bill should not pass.

So the bill is rejected.

Mr. HALL, of Georgia, who had voted against the bill, then moved a reconsideration of the vote just taken. He said he was opposed to this bill, and should be opposed to any bill for the establishment of a National Bank; but he was willing that his friends should have an opportunity of giving such a shape to a bill on that subject, as should unite the votes of all who were friendly on principle to the establishment of a National Bank.

The question for a reconsideration of the vote having been stated from the Chair—a motion was made to adjourn, and decided in the affirmative.

TUESDAY, January 3.

Another member, to wit: from Massachusetts, ABIEL WOOD, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. FISK, of New York, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the amendments of the Senate to the bill for taxing certain manufactures, reported in favor of an agreement to all the amendments of the Senate, except that one which proposed a tax of eight per cent. ad valorem on all umbrellas or parasols. This report was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, from the Judiciary Committee, to whom was referred the petition of sundry citizens of New York on that subject, reported a bill to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, from the Naval Committee, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, authorizing the appointment of certain naval officers therein named, reported the same without amendment; and it was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

A message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the proceedings under the act for laying out the great western road—Referred to a select committee.

The amendments of the Senate to the furniture tax bill, were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, being a motion to reconsider the vote to reject the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America.

[On this motion there arose a desultory but very interesting debate, which occupied the House from 12 to about 5 o'clock. We must content ourselves with very briefly stating the several grounds taken by the gentlemen who spoke on the one side or the other.—Editors.]

Mr. HALL, of Georgia, commenced the debate by assigning the reasons which had influenced him to move a reconsideration of the question; which were, generally, that though he was and should continue to be opposed to any bank that could be established, unless within the District of Columbia, yet the state of the vote of last night gave him reason to believe that some plan might be adopted to meet the views of what was evidently a majority of the House on that subject. He therefore proposed, if the vote should be reconsidered, to call up the proposition laid upon the table by him some time ago, respecting an issue of Treasury notes, and to move its reference, together with this bill, to the Committee of Ways and Means; that, from a combination of the principles of both, some measure might be adopted which would subserve the public interest. He called upon gentlemen of the majority, in an impressive manner, to rally themselves around the public good, to sacrifice to each other a little of their own opinion, in order to serve the nation. Having to contend not only with a foreign enemy, but with internal traitors, it was high time, instead of putting themselves into the hands of merchants and men who are determined, if they could, to crush the present Administration, to draw on the real, solid resources of the nation, &c. Mr. H. took occasion to express his disgust at the attempt, twice repeated, which he had witnessed, to prevent an individual from voting, because he had lent money to the Government or held Government security (meaning Mr. INGERSOLL.) Such proceedings, he said, made his blood run cold. They required the friends of the Government to unite, to beware how they act, instead of aiding those whose only object was to defeat every act calculated for the defence of the country, &c.

Mr. ALEXANDER, of Ohio, made a few general remarks as to the readiness with which he should approach this question to reconsider what had been denounced as a rash, desperate, and destructive measure. His remarks were evidently intended to reflect on the observations with which the SPEAKER had on the preceding evening prefaced his vote. He should feel no pain, he said, when acting from his own choice, in giving a vote which was to destroy a ruinous measure; he should rather rejoice in the opportunity of giving such a vote, and not complain that he did it with pain, &c.

Mr. McKEE, of Kentucky, favored the reconsideration of the bill, in the hope that, when reconsidered, it would be recommitted, and its features changed. He had voted for it in its present shape with much reluctance; he had so voted, however, because he believed the taxes could not be paid by the people unless they were aided by the establishment of a medium of general circulation, &c. He did not believe, in its present shape, that the bill would pass; but he did believe it might be so modified as to meet the views of a majority of the House.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, said he should vote for a reconsideration of the bill, because he was of the same opinion to-day that he was yesterday. He was not tenacious as to the plan of it, but a National Bank he believed to be indispensable, &c. He took occasion to remark, in allusion to the observation of Mr. HALL, that although he, with several other gentlemen of the House, possessed a small interest in the public stock, he had no idea that it could disqualify him or any one else from voting on this question, any more than on the tax or any other revenue or loan bills, &c.

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, said he should vote against reconsideration; for, although he had of late uniformly entertained the opinion, that it would be convenient and expedient to establish a National Bank, he as firmly believed that there was no delegated power in Congress to establish such a bank. He had given such votes as he thought calculated to improve or perfect the various bills before the House, but he must eventually vote against any bank. Mr. M. concluded his examination of this question by expressing the opinion that Treasury notes would circulate and obtain as good a credit as the notes of the bank proposed to be established; and to those the nation must, he believed, at last resort, &c.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, was in favor of reconsideration, and made an animated appeal to those who were friendly to the establishment of a bank, and yet had opposed this bill because the details did not exactly meet their views. He called upon them to sacrifice their particular prejudices, and not prostrate the public interest at the shrine of their own pride or independence of opinion. Scarcely any subject, he said, could come before the House, in regard to which gentlemen might not urge that there were certain of the details which did not meet their approbation, and for which they could not vote. This bill had been called a desperate, a dangerous measure. It might be so, Mr. R. said; but, from the nettle danger we frequently pluck the flower safety. Nothing could be more dangerous than the very situation in which we now are; which could not be worsened even by the failure of the novel experiment which this bill had been pronounced to be, &c.

Mr. ALSTON, of North Carolina, said he should vote against reconsideration. Believing no good could result from further attempts to unite conflicting opinions on this subject; he was in favor of putting it to rest, and letting the responsibility rest on the shoulders of those who had twice already defeated the bill, &c.

Mr. DUVAL, of Kentucky, in advocating a reconsideration, called upon those who had refused to sacrifice their individual opinions, to remember the sacrifices made by those of their own party, and to exhibit that liberality and spirit of mutual concession, without which there could be no legislation. He believed there was a decided majority in the House in favor of a National Bank, and he entreated gentlemen to consent to recommendation, to make one last effort to save the sinking credit of the country, &c. He dwelt at some length on the absurdity of every man in a public body clinging to his own opinion as the standard of perfection. Unless men yield occasionally their particular opinions on minor points and mere matters of detail, no majority could ever be obtained in favor of any particular measure. He had thus yielded his opinions when he voted for this bill, and he hoped a sufficient number would now do so to obtain a reconsideration.

Mr. GHOLSON, of Virginia, conjured gentlemen to put an end to debate, and to act. While they were debating, the Army was suffering for the want of necessary supplies; the nation was suffering at every point. He entreated gentlemen to permit the question to be taken.

Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, addressing himself to the majority of the House, exhorted them to unite, and no longer suffer themselves to be driven from ground to ground, from shift to shift, by the pertinacity of a minority who openly disavowed any responsibility for the failure of measures which they were frequently the means of thwarting. He adverted to the majority which a day or two ago had appeared in favor of this bill, who had been driven from their ground by the pertinacity of the minority, in violation of the usages and decorum of legislation, &c. He appealed also to the liberality of those opposed to this bill on mere points of detail, whether an opportunity ought not to be afforded to those who were friendly to the principle to try this question again. He dwelt with much emphasis on the weight of responsibility attaching to every one who voted on this question, and the propriety of allowing them to vote again, on a vote on which the House was equally divided, after having an opportunity since to reflect on it.

Mr. PEARSON expressed himself favorably towards a National Bank, but as strongly opposed to the bill now before the House, the vote on which he would not consent to reconsider, lest the bill might then pass, though he was willing to suspend the rule of the House forbidding a bill once rejected to be originated anew, so as to give an opportunity to obtain the establishment of a bank on proper banking principles, &c.

Mr. FISK, of New York, said the very importance of this bill was a reason why a question, decided as it had been, should be reconsidered; that, if a majority should not favor its passage in its present shape, it might be put in such a form as should insure it the support of a majority. The proposal of the gentleman who preceded him, to dispense with the rule, he considered as more objectionable by far, than the practice of reconsidering a vote.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, at some length, warmly contended for the reconsideration of the bill, avowing himself still friendly to it, in preference to any other plan which could be proposed.

Mr. CALHOUN was in favor of reconsideration of the bill, but on different grounds from Mr. FORSYTH. He was and should continue opposed to the present bill.

Mr. GASTON, Mr. CULPEPER, Mr. WEBSTER, and Mr. GROSVENOR, expressed themselves friendly to a National Bank on the principles they have heretofore advocated, but decidedly opposed to this, and therefore determined to vote against reconsidering it, though they were willing to suspend the rule forbidding future reconsideration.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, advocated reconsideration of the bill, on the grounds of partiality to the form of the present bill, which he examined and supported by a train of argument going to exhibit its particular merits.

Mr. HALL then said he had made his motion with the hope of obtaining a compromise of conflicting opinions, and a modification of the present bill. But, finding its friends so wedded to it as to attempt to force it through the House, he withdrew his motion for a reconsideration.

Mr. WEBSTER took this opportunity to lay upon the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That the rule of the House which prevents a subject once acted upon from being acted upon again during the same session, be suspended until otherwise ordered.

Mr. MCKIM renewed the motion to reconsider the vote on the Bank bill; not from any intention to change his vote, but from a disposition to accommodate his friends on a question of so much magnitude.

Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, opposed, and Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, advocated the reconsideration—the one, on grounds of unabated hostility to the present bill; the other from a disposition to afford the utmost latitude to the consideration of a subject so highly important to the nation.

The question on reconsideration was at length decided by yeas and nays.—For reconsideration 107, against it 54, as follows:

And the question being again stated—"Shall the bill pass?"—

Mr. McKEE moved to recommit the bill to a select committee, and presented his view of the change which he conceived ought to be made in its provisions.

Mr. BUTLER, of Vermont, supported this motion, and in a speech of some length exhibited his views on the same subject.

Mr. FORSYTH opposed the recommitment with much zeal and eloquence, on grounds of preference to the present bill.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, expressed his opinions generally in hostility to the establishment of any bank at this time, and in opposition to any compromise.

Mr. FINDLEY advocated the recommitment, principally on the ground of opposition to that feature of the bill which requires the bank to make a loan to Government—which he believed at once superfluous and inexpedient.

Mr. OAKLEY and Mr. STOCKTON advocated recommitment with earnestness and ability, in order to procure a modification of the details. If modified, as they believed it might be, they pledged themselves to vote for the bank bill, and expressed their opinion that in that vote they would be joined by a majority of their political friends.

The question on recommitment was decided by yeas and nays. For recommitment 89, against it 71, as follows:

And it was determined to recommit the bill to a select committee of seven members.

MESSRS. McKEE, FINDLEY, STOCKTON, PITKIN, TAYLOR, CUTHBERT, and YANCEY, were appointed the committee.

WEDNESDAY, January 4.

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS, the House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 30th ultimo, and the same being modified, was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Executive authorities of the several States and Territories of the United States, respectively, by law, to apprehend, secure, and deliver to the Government, for the time being, of any Territory of the United States, or his agent, any fugitive or fugitives from justice, upon demand being made of the Executive authority of any such State or Territory, to which such fugitive or fugitives shall have fled, and upon producing an indictment found, or an affidavit made before a competent officer, charging the person so demanded with having committed treason, felony, or other crime, within the jurisdiction of the said Territory from which he so fled; and what amendments, if any, are necessary to the act or acts respecting persons escaping from the service of their masters.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their amendments proposed to the bill "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, on horses kept exclusively for the saddle or carriage, and on gold and silver watches." The Senate recede from their first amendment proposed to the bill "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on various goods, wares, and merchandise, manufactured within the United States;" and they insist on that part of their fifth amendment to the said bill to which this House have disagreed.

Mr. FISK, of New York, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the amendments of the Senate to the furniture tax bill, recommended a disagreement to the same; and the question being taken thereon, they were accordingly disagreed to.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the better regulation of the Ordnance department; which was twice read, and committed.

H. OF R.

The bill from the Senate, to provide for leasing lands reserved for the use of schools in the Mississippi Territory, was read a third time, and passed.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill for taxing certain manufactures, were considered in Committee of the Whole, and afterwards in the House. Those amendments which go to exempt "pig iron" from taxation, and add "umbrellas and parasols," were disagreed to, and the others were agreed to.

The House spent some time in Committee of the Whole on the bill to prohibit intercourse with the enemy, and for other purposes; which underwent a considerable discussion, until late in the day, when the Committee rose, reported progress and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, January 5.

A message was received from the Senate, announcing their recession from all their amendments to the bill laying duties on certain manufactures, except so much as proposes to lay a duty of eight per cent. on all umbrellas and parasols above the value of two dollars.

Mr. Fisk, of New York, stated that the principal difficulty with the Committee of Ways and Means, in assenting to this amendment, had been a doubt of the Constitutional power of the Senate, to propose new taxes. As this was a question which he believed had never been decided; and as the tax was in itself unimportant, he moved that the House insist on its disagreement to this amendment. This motion was agreed to.

The House also determined to insist on disagreement to a part of of the amendments of the Senate, to the furniture tax bill, and to ask of the Senate a conference on that bill.

INTERCOURSE WITH THE ENEMY.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill for preventing intercourse with the enemy. [This is a bill containing ample and energetic provisions, for preventing the treasonable intercourse, which has recently prevailed to so great an extent on our northern borders, and elsewhere.] The whole amendments made in Committee of the Whole having been agreed to—

Mr. GROSVENOR moved to strike out the fifth section of the bill; which is as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every Collector of the Customs shall have authority to appoint, within his district, such number of inspectors of the customs as he shall judge necessary, who are hereby declared to be officers of the customs: Provided, however, That it shall be discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury, what number of such inspectors shall be paid for their services by the respective collectors, out of the revenue of the United States; and the said inspectors, before they enter upon the duties of their offices, shall take and subscribe before the collectors appointing them, or before some magistrate within their respective districts, authorized by law to administer oaths, the following oath or affirmation, to wit: I, —, having been appointed an inspector of the customs, within and for the district of —, do solemnly, sincerely, and truly swear, or affirm, (as the case may be,) that I will diligently and faithfully execute the duties of the said office of inspector, and will use my best endeavors to prevent and detect frauds and violations against the laws of the United States; I further swear, or affirm, that I will support the Constitution of the United States.

This motion gave rise to an extended debate, in which many gentlemen partook, and was decided in the negative—for the motion 51, against it 85, as follows:

The sixth section of the bill is as follows:

Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bines, Bowen, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Chappell, Clendenin, Clopton, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Gholson, Gourdin, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Hubbard, Humphreys, Ingham, Irving, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Leferts, Lyle, McCoy, McKim, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Seybert, Sharp, Smith of Pennsylvania, Strong, Tannehill, Udree, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Yancey.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the bill as follows:

Section 1, line 8. After the word "duty," insert "the payment thereof intended to be evaded."

Section 3, lines 8 and 9. Strike out the words "or of which they may be in possession."

Section 4, line 22. After the word "building," insert "in day-time only."

Section 8, line 28. Strike out the words "now pending or."

And the question being taken on the said amendments, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. WILSON, of Massachusetts, moved to add to the third section the following words: "or for the use of any citizen residing within the limits of the United States." Which motion was determined in the negative.

It appearing about this time, owing to the retirement of a number of the members of the House, that a quorum was not present, a motion was made for a call of the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR contended that one day's notice was necessary to a call of the House. The Chair decided such notice was not necessary. Mr. GROSVENOR appealed from this decision, which the House affirmed.

The call of the House then took place, when it appeared that the following members were present:

Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bines, Bowen, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Chappell, Clark, Clendenin, Clopton, Comstock, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Gholson, Gourdin, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hale, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hulbert, Ingham, Irving, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Leferts, Lovett, Lyle, McCoy, McKim, Miller, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Pleasants, John Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Ringgold, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Seybert, Sharp, Smith of Pennsylvania, Strong, Sturges, Tannehill, Taylor, Udree, Vose, Ward of New Jersey, Wilson of Massachusetts, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wood, and Yancey—92.

The doors of the House were then closed, according to the rules of the House, and ingress and egress forbidden, but not before two or three other members had come in.

Some difficulty arose as to the course now proper to be pursued as to compelling the attendance of absentees, &c. At length, on motion of Mr. YANCEY, it was ordered that all further proceedings on the call be suspended; and the bill, which had been all day under debate, was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading without a division—a sufficient number not rising to support the motion of Mr. MILLER, for the yeas and nays.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "for the relief of William Gamble," in which they ask the concurrence of this House: They have agreed to the conference asked by this House, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments depending to the bill "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, on horses kept exclusively for the saddle or carriage, and on gold and silver watches," and have appointed managers on their part. They ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on various goods, wares, and merchandise, manufactured within the United States," to which conference they have appointed managers on their part.

FRIDAY, January 6.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "supplementary to the act, entitled "An act providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice, and referred to the committee appointed on the letter on the same subject from the acting Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General.

Another message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment depending to the bill "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on various goods, wares, and merchandise, manufactured within the United States;" to which conference they have appointed managers on their part.

Resolved, That this House agree to the conference asked by the Senate on the bill last mentioned, and that Mr. EPPES, Mr. FISK of New York, and Mr. OAKLEY, be the managers at the said conference on the part of this House.

The bill from the Senate, "for the relief of William Gamble," was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. FISK, from the managers appointed by the House to attend a conference with the managers appointed by the Senate, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments depending to the bill "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, on horses kept exclusively for the saddle or carriage, and on gold and silver watches," made a report; which was read: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, so far as the same relate to the duty on horses kept exclusively for the saddle or carriage, and that they also recede from their disagreement to the amendment to the fifth section, and that they do agree to the amendments therein specified.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. McKEE, from the select committee to whom was recommitted the bill from the Senate to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America, reported sundry amendments thereto; which were read.

A motion was then made by Mr. ROBERTSON to lay the report on the table for one day, that it might be printed for the more particular information of the members; which motion was negatived, ayes 36.

Mr. McKEE explained, briefly, the nature and amount of the amendments now proposed to the bill. The first principle introduced into the bill, he said, was a reduction of the capital stock from fifty to thirty millions; such capital to be composed of five millions in specie, fifteen millions in Treasury notes, ten millions in stock of the United States created since the declaration of the war. The capital to be subscribable in shares of one hundred instead of five hundred each. The payments of the subscription to be so apportioned that two-fifths of the amount of the capital should be paid in at the time of subscribing. This would bring at once into the bank, $1,666,000 in specie, and the residue in Treasury notes and stock, amounting to twelve millions in the whole. There was every reason to believe that this payment could be made, at the time of subscription, to the full amount proposed; if so, the bank could forthwith go into operation, and its capital would not remain inactive, as a part of it must do if a less amount were payable at the time of subscription. The principle requiring the bank to make a loan of thirty millions to the Government to be stricken out, and the provision respecting the suspension of payments in specie, which appeared to be inseparably connected with the compulsory loan, to be also stricken out. The immediate aid which the plan would afford to the Government, in addition to the establishment of a circulating medium of undoubted credit, would be in the issue and free circulation of fifteen millions of Treasury notes and the relief to the stock market by the abstraction from it of ten millions to be subscribed in the stock of the bank. The bank thus to be established was predicated on the idea of a specie bank, on which principle alone must forever rest a sound circulating medium. There was no danger, as had been frequently observed, but, without a requisition to that effect in its charter, the bank would, for its own interests, afford to the Government every assistance and accommodation in its power. A right was also reserved to the Government to subscribe on its own behalf and for its benefit, whenever Congress shall authorize it by law, five millions to the stock of the bank, payable in certificates of stock bearing an interest of four per centum. This stock it might sell at great advantage, even during the present year, if the bank went successfully into operation.

The amendments to the first section having been stated, and the question being proposed to the House on that amendment which reduces the proposed capital from fifty to thirty millions of dollars—

Mr. TELFAIR, of Georgia, being desirous of fixing the capital of the bank at forty millions, as a proper medium, said he should vote against this amendment, and briefly assigned his reasons for so doing.

Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, stated the reasons why he should vote against this amendment, though willing to make what he deemed reasonable concession to those who differed from him.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, made a few observations, principally expressive of a hope that this question would be decided with as little debate as possible.

Mr. TAYLOR explained at some length the reasons, which had induced him, as a last effort to relieve the finances of the country by the establishment of a bank, to consent to this report, embracing a compromise of his own opinions. He spoke at some length in explanation of the provisions of this bill, and of the advantage which it held forth to the public interest, &c.

Mr. FORSYTH briefly stated the grounds on which he was opposed to the report of the committee, and preferred the bill in its present shape. If the amendments prevailed, he contended that the will of the majority would in fact be defeated, and a bill passed on a plan, of which the majority had already expressed their decided disapprobation.

Mr. McKEE spoke at some length in defence of the report, and to show its superiority to the present features of the bill.

Mr. INGERSOLL explained briefly why, although entertaining a decided preference for the bill, as it now stood, he should vote for the report of the committee in all its parts; because, being the result of a compromise, if it were not accepted, he feared no National Bank would be established—a measure which he deemed at this moment absolutely indispensable.

Mr. YANCEY said he should give the report his decided support, and regretted that any of his friends should act differently. He considered the proposed amendments highly expedient, and, withal, that, if they were not adopted, no bank could be established at this session.

Mr. PITKIN, in a speech of some length, explained the reasons why he had been induced to compromise a part of his own opinions, in agreeing to this report, to which he had acceded with some reluctance, and for the success of which he did not consider himself responsible. Being willing to lend his aid to extricate the Government from its present financial difficulties, he had agreed to this report, which however he believed embraced much too extensive a scale for the proposed institution. He went into an examination at some length of the principles of banking, principally to show that a forced loan would be destructive to the ability or prospects of any bank.

Mr. FORSYTH replied at some length to some of the objections which had been made to the bill as it now stands, and in vindication of his own opinion; and

Mr. PEARSON added a few words of explanation in reply to a part of Mr. FORSYTH's speech.

The question being taken, after nearly two hours debate, on the first amendment reported by the select committee, was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Anderson, Archer, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Bines, Bowen, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Burwell, Butler, Caperton, Calhoun, Cannon, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Clark, Clendenin, Clopton, Comstock, Cox, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dana, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, NAYS—Messrs. Alston, Brown, Caldwell, Conard, Denoyelles, Eppes, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forsyth, Franklin, Gourdin, Griffin, Hall, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Ingham, Irwin, Kilbourn, Leferts, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, Murfree, Nelson, Parker, Ringgold, Roane, Sevier, Telfair, and Wilson of Pennsylvania—31.

The other amendments, as indicated above in Mr. McKEE's remarks, were then all agreed to—among them being an amendment to postpone the opening of the books of subscription to the last instead of the second Monday in February.

A motion was made by Mr. GASTON further to amend the bill, by striking out that part of the amendment describing the (war) stock which shall be subscribable to the bank, and inserting in lieu thereof, "or in any of the public debt of the United States drawing an accruing interest of six per centum per annum, contracted or to be contracted by virtue of any act of Congress;" which motion was negatived.

The bill as amended was then ordered, without a division, to be read a third time to-morrow.

SATURDAY, January 7.

Mr. FISK of New York, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of John Brahany; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. OAKLEY, from the committee to whom was referred the bill from the Senate "supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory,'" reported the same with amendments; which were committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "to authorize the President of the United States to accept the services of volunteers who may organize themselves, and offer their services to the Government of the United States," with amendments; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The engrossed bill to prevent intercourse with the enemy having been read through—bill on the table, to take up the Bank bill, the passage of which he feared might be too long delayed by the discussion which might arise on the bill just read. This motion was supported by Mr. YANCEY and Mr. INGERSOLL.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. FISK of New York, FISK of Vermont, and RHEA, on the ground that the speedy passage of the bill just read, was required by the interest and honor of the nation, to arrest the supplies to the enemy, and the loss of duties on smuggled goods, which our revenue officers now could not, dare not, attempt to seize.

The motion to lay the bill on the table prevailed, ayes 83.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The engrossed amendments to the bill from the Senate "to incorporate the Bank of the United States of America," were then read, and the question stated, "Shall this bill pass, as amended?" and the yeas and nays thereon having been required by Mr. STANFORD—

Mr. FISK, of New York, rose to assign the reasons which now influenced him to vote against this bill. His objections were, to the reduction of the capital, and to the omission of what had been miscalled the forced loan feature of the bill, which he considered one of the best. The bill, before it was amended, would, he said, have afforded to the Government a benefit to the amount of twenty millions, but now would not afford to it a greater bonus than three millions. He objected to the amendments which had taken from the bill the control which the Government ought to have over it, and would throw the Government and the moneyed resources of the nation into the power of its political adversaries. There were also other features of the bill to which he objected; so strongly, upon the whole, that he would not vote for the bill.

Mr. HANSON, of Maryland, expressed his regret to see any impediment thrown in the way of the bill. He expressed all the satisfaction he felt at being able on this occasion to redeem his pledge to co-operate with the majority, in any measure which he could hope or believe would be beneficial to the nation. This bill, in its present shape, he remarked, was the result of a compromise produced by mutual and magnanimous concessions, and at a period like this, of bitter political animosity, concessions reflecting equal honor on both sides of the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, assigned, at some length, the reason why he should vote against the bill. He expressed, in a feeling manner, his regret at being compelled to vote, on this occasion, against so many of those with whom he had heretofore acted in opposition to the measures of this Administration. His objections were more to the time when and purposes for which a bank is to be established, than to the features of this bill, to some of which he objected. He denied that it could be a specie bank, or that the bank would ever be able to get a million of its notes into circulation. The Government relying upon it would be disappointed, and ruin soon stare them in the face. He denied the operation upon himself of the argument that this was a lesser evil than what might be substituted for it if it did not pass. He would not, he said, embrace this evil in order to avoid a greater which might not happen; he would never, he said, adopt a principle looking towards that which imports that the end may justify the means.

Mr. TELFAIR, of Georgia, stated the reasons why, although he decidedly approved of the bill which had been first before the House, he should yet vote for this bill. He was seriously convinced, he said, that under the present embarrassment of our circulating medium, and of the fiscal concerns of the nation, that a bank was indispensable; and, though the system now before the House was one, the details of which he could not approve, he would vote for it as a last resort. He frankly intimated his hope that the other House would propose some modification of the amendments of this House, that would render the compromise of opinion more equitable than as it now stood. Mr. T. went into a general examination of the principles and history of banking, principally to show that banks founded on the credit of Governments and on public stocks had not been as generally unsuccessful as had been contended; and he then compared the present system with that which came from the Senate, to the latter of which he gave a decided preference.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, believed, he said, a National Bank to be essentially necessary to give relief to the present embarrassed state of things. Believing this bill would contribute in some degree to relieve the national wants, it would receive his vote, though reluctantly; and he wished it to be distinctly understood, that instead of its being a preferred measure, he considered the first bill as more efficient and calculated to give the Government all it wanted. The vote of the House this day, he said, would be no test of the excellence of this system, or even of the approbation of it by the House—the question being whether the House would take this or no bank. Mr. I. made a statement of the comparative advantages and disadvantages of the two plans, giving the decided superiority to the original plan.

The question on the final passage of this bill was then decided—yeas 120, nays 38, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. So the bill was passed.

TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. LAW, of Connecticut, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the several laws authorizing the issuing of Treasury notes, in such manner as to make them receivable in payment in all cases of fines, forfeitures, penalties, and executions, which may accrue, be due or owing to the United States; and also, to extend the said laws so as to make Treasury notes receivable in payment for taxes due to the United States from any number of persons who may unite for that purpose, and report thereon.

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, desired to know the object of this motion. It appeared to him, on the first view, that it would introduce a speculation in the Government paper, immoral in itself, and injurious to the public credit. Every individual was by existing laws authorized to pay his particular taxes in Treasury notes.

Mr. LAW said, his object was not to encourage speculation, but to enable the people to pay their taxes upon an equal footing. At present, if several persons having taxes to pay can make up the precise amount they owe in Treasury notes, the collectors will not receive them, alleging that they are so instructed by the Treasury Department. Treasury notes were not now issued of any denomination less than twenty dollars; and yet, if two persons owing ten dollars each, tendered such a note in payment, the collector would not receive it. The consequence of which is, that such persons have to procure specie to pay their taxes, nothing else being receivable. He had, therefore, thought it would be advisable that the Committee of Ways and Means should inquire into the subject.

Mr. BIGELOW, of Massachusetts, confirmed the statement of Mr. LAW, having received, as he said, several letters from his district of the same import. He had understood that the Secretary of the Treasury complained that all the taxes were paid in Treasury notes. He knew not how that could be, as he knew that most of the taxes, in his district at least, were paid in other money; unless that the collectors receive the taxes in good money, and instead of paying it into the Treasury, make use of it to buy in Treasury notes at a discount to pay into the Treasury, and make a profit from the difference.

Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, moved to amend the motion so as to strike out that part of it authorizing associations for paying taxes in Treasury notes. He stated his knowledge of the fact, that the Treasury Department had it in contemplation to issue notes of a smaller denomination than those now in circulation, which would obviate altogether the difficulty the gentleman desired to remedy.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. POTTER, BAYLIES, and LAW.

Mr. FISK, of New York, moved to lay the resolve on the table; which motion was supported by Mr. EPPES, and agreed to, 61 to 56.

MONDAY, January 9.

Mr. INGERSOLL presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Philadelphia, praying for the passage of a law establishing an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill to establish an uniform system of Bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. LATTIMORE presented a petition of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying that a law may be passed authorizing the appointment of an additional Judge for that part of the Territory which lies east of Pearl river.—Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. EASTON,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire, if any, what, further provisions, by law, are expedient to be made for ratifying the unconfirmed claims to land in the Territory of Missouri, and to provide for their location.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire, if any, what, alterations or amendments are necessary to be made in the act, entitled "An act for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri."

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH,

Resolved, That the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business be, and they are hereby, instructed to report to this House a bill to continue in force the act "declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the Legislature of Georgia, passed on the 13th of December, 1804, establishing the fees of the harbor master and health officer of the ports of Savannah and St. Mary's," being a part of the unfinished business of the last session of Congress.

On motion of Mr. KILBOURN,

Resolved, That the resolution and petition of the Legislature of the Illinois Territory, relating to the protection of the Northwestern frontier, and sundry memorials of the citizens of the United States west of the Alleghany mountains, upon the same subject, which were presented to this House at the last session and referred, be again referred to the committee having that subject under consideration.

Mr. YANCEY reported a bill for the relief of Joseph Perkins; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "to authorize the President of the United States to accept the services of volunteers who may associate and organize themselves, and offer their services to the Government of the United States," were read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be built, equipped, and employed, one or more floating batteries, for the defence of the waters of the United States;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill for the relief of Schultz and Vogeler and others, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of James Doyle; the bill for the relief of William H. Washington; and the bill for the relief of William Robinson and others, severally passed through Committees of the Whole and were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A bill for quitting and adjusting claims to land in the Mississippi Territory occupied the remainder of the day; and the Committee obtained leave to sit again thereon.

THE NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. WILLIAM REED, from the committee appointed on the 18th of March last, to inquire whether any, and, if any what, means of retrenchment and economy, and of reform in the general management, and of extension and efficiency in the Naval Establishment, may be practicable and expedient, made a detailed report; which was read, and is as follows:

That, having considered the several important subjects referred to them, they do not deem it useful to exhibit to the House a detail of the various abuses which have prevailed in the Naval Establishment. Such a detail, though it might lead to the detection of individual delinquents, would not afford redress for former abuses or prevent their repetition; for it was obvious to your committee that these abuses were either sanctioned by the forms of law, or, for the want of adequate provisions and penalties in the law, must remain unpunished. After having examined and availed themselves of the labors of their predecessors in their investigations, made under the direction of this House, and referred to this committee, they have concluded that it is unnecessary and unprofitable further to extend that investigation, and that it would be more satisfactory to the House, and more promotive of the object of their appointment, to limit their efforts to "a reform in the general management of this establishment." Under a full conviction that the experience of this war has already satisfied the most scrupulous of the ability of this country to create and equip a naval force, competent not only to the defence of our extensive maritime frontier, but also for the great annoyance of a foreign enemy; and that such a force is now equally demanded by every section of our country, as indispensable for its security; the committee have likewise deemed it unnecessary to go into an argument to show the propriety of bestowing upon this branch of our national force, that measure of increase and support which its brilliant exploits on the ocean and on the lakes, and its efficiency in annoying the trade of the enemy, during this war, under all the abuses to which it has been exposed, have shown, should only be limited by our means.

The opinion that has existed from the first establishment of this Department, and been declared successively by almost every Secretary, that the duties incumbent on them were greater and more diversified than the most capable and laborious could discharge, with honor to himself and justice to the nation, led the committee to an examination of the system as now established, and the abuses that resulted from it. In prosecution of this examination, especially on that part which applies to the detail of service, they have principally relied on the information derived from the intelligent and experienced officers of the Navy, whom they have always found ready and desirous of giving all the information in their power. By the information obtained from this and other sources, the committee are convinced that most, if not all the abuses complained of are attributable to three distinct causes:

First. The excessive and laborious duties of the Secretary.

Second. The want of sufficient checks upon, and the consequent irresponsibility of, subordinate agents.

Third. The great latitude allowed commanders in altering, repairing, and furnishing their ships.

It is presumed to be unnecessary to offer to the House any further evidence of this statement than is contained in the following extract from the report of the late Secretary of the Navy, made to the Senate of the United States on the 15th November last:

"But regulations, however correct and adequate to the end, become nugatory or worse, unless the authority and the means are co-extensive and competent to enforce the execution or punish the violation thereof. This may account for the non-existence of many wholesome regulations in the civil administration of the Navy of the United States, and for the imperfect execution of those which exist. Breaches of the latter too frequently escape with impunity, from the impossibility of the Head of the Department taking cognizance of all the multifarious concerns of the establishment."

Great and obvious as the defects in this establishment are by all confessed to be, the committee have felt no little anxiety as to the best mode of correcting them. Desirous equally of avoiding the opposite errors, of rashly changing from one system to another without an attempt to correct known abuses, or loading it with formal but inefficient appendages, which more frequently encumber than relieve, or give energy to its operations; and concurring in the opinion expressed by the late Secretary, in the report before referred to, that a board, composed of intelligent and experienced officers, in aid of the executive of this Department, would most effectually accomplish this object, and if properly organized, avoid the dangers from too great innovation on one hand and inefficiency on the other, they directed a copy of this report to be forwarded to every captain in the Navy of the United States, with the annexed circular, marked A. From the answers thereto, which invariably approve the general design, it was thought unnecessary to publish more than those which contained particular observations upon the plan submitted. These are annexed, numbered 1 to 8.

From these materials, collected from intelligent and practical sources, the committee have endeavored to digest a plan which, they unanimously believe, if adopted, will immediately correct many of the abuses complained of, and lay the foundation of an improved system for the management of this Department. They, therefore, beg leave to recommend the adoption of the two bills accompanying this report.

A.—[Circular.]

WASHINGTON, Nov. 17, 1814.

SIR: I am directed, by the committee appointed under a resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted on the 15th of March last, "authorizing and directing an inquiry into the expediency and practicability of reform in the Naval Department of the United States," to forward for your examination a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to the Senate of the United States" of the 18th, communicating his views and plans for effecting this object; and to request you to favor the committee with your opinion of the plan proposed by the Secretary, and to suggest such additions and alterations as shall appear to you necessary for attaining this desirable object.

With respect I am, sir, your very obedient servant.

Observations, submitted to the Naval Committee, on the report of the Secretary of the Navy to the Senate of the United States, dated the 15th November, 1814, relative to the better organization of the Navy of the United States.

I should, for the reasons which follow, recommend three instead of five Navy inspectors; that they be taken from the captains in the Navy; and that the officer of the oldest date of commission should preside. 1st. I believe that three inspectors are adequate to the performance of the duties contemplated, and this number will be sufficient to form a quorum. If it should be said, that, by confining the board to the number of three, it might be rendered incompetent by the death or disability of a member, it may be replied, that, while the President has the power of supplying the deficiency from the captains in the Navy, this objection can have no force. 2d. I recommend the appointment of Navy officers in preference to gentlemen out of the Navy, who may be skilled in naval affairs, because, in a science in which, of all others, experience has set theory at defiance, practical men only should be allowed to act; and I firmly believe the officers of the Navy, after many years of experience in the naval service and of constant reflection on the subject, are better qualified to execute the duties required than any other characters. 3d. The officer whose commission is of the oldest date should preside, because, by such an arrangement, no offence could be given to individual feeling, and that union and harmony would be preserved which are so necessary to insure a co-operation of mind and action.

2d. I should recommend the following alteration in the fourth section: Instead of the Secretary of the Navy preparing the rules and regulations for conducting the business of the naval constructor's department, that that duty be assigned to the board of inspectors, who would always be professional men, and thereby judges of the matter. And it might happen that the Secretary of the Navy would not be a nautical character.

3d. The respective duties, designated in five classes, it appears to me would be much better conducted under the general direction of the board than could be done under the separate direction of the respective members, inasmuch as the greater part of the duties detailed therein are specified in the general duties of the board, and the whole are placed under its control; and more especially as a considerable part would require, for the public interest, the united talents of the board. And should it be found, from experience, which is the only test, that a select distribution of duties ought to be made among the members of the board, with due deference I suggest that the board would be enabled, from actual experiment, to recommend the best classification of duties for such inspector. A system so complicated and extensive as a perfect organization of the civil department of the navy cannot be expected, even under the direction of the best talents, to be the work of a day. But the want of some uniform system in the Naval Department of our country has evidently manifested itself; and the adoption of the general principles for such a system, as recommended by the honorable Secretary of the Navy, I doubt not would be attended with the most favorable result.

UNITED STATES' FRIGATE CONSTITUTION,
Boston Harbor, November 26, 1814.

SIR: I received the honor of your circular letter of the 17th instant, enclosing a report of the honorable Secretary of the Navy to the honorable Senate of the United States, relating to the organization of the Navy Department. You express a desire that the committee may be possessed of my opinion of the plan proposed, and that I should suggest such additions and alterations as may appear to me necessary for attaining so desirable an object.

It appears to me, sir, and is my opinion, that the plan proposed by the report will contribute towards the desired end, but I do not think it calculated to obtain the whole object proposed by Congress. Viewing it as an auxiliary to the Navy Department, it will unquestionably facilitate the operations and relieve the officers of that Department from much of the detail duties, which all must be aware are too extensive and diversified for any one person to discharge with necessity and due attention. We must also be aware how difficult it is to change a system once begun, and whose basis is not established on the best foundation, though it should afterwards be found inadequate to the object.

If we compare this new and young nation, rising in the Western hemisphere, and progressing towards a zenith of greatness which may cast a shade over some of the oldest and most enlightened nations of the Eastern, to a young man commencing life, with the experience of his predecessors, whereby to regulate his conduct and economy, would not his error strike us forcibly, on observing him erecting temporary structure after structure, instead of raising on solid foundations the ground work of his future comfort and prosperity, which would bid defiance to time, and could only be shaken by the general wreck of things? Presuming the Legislature wish to establish the marine of this country on the best possible foundation, and calculated to be conducted with the greatest economy in all its various branches, I do apprehend the plan submitted will not be found to effect that object, and will fall far short of the end contemplated.

Of the first section, it will only be necessary to remark, that it would be injudicious to destroy the department, but highly essential to reorganize it.

The second section provides five inspectors of the Navy, to form a sort of navy board, which will contribute no further than to relieve the department from some of the detail service, and sharing with it certain portions of the responsibility. The principal objection to a board of inspectors constituted as I apprehend, arises from its not combining the variety and necessary practical knowledge and information among its members requisite on many important subjects that will come before them.

The assigning to individuals of the board of inspectors (as contemplated by the third section) distinct control over, and responsibility for, specific portions of the service, can and will answer no purpose whatever.

The provisions of the fourth section will be highly essential at all events.

Section the fifth may or may not be requisite; in the latter case the office could at any time be created.

Sections six and seven will only be requisite if the plan is adopted.

As the principal features in the plan of the bill proposed are contained in the section providing the board of inspectors, it will only be necessary to remark, in support of my objection above, that the duties contemplated to be assigned to this board would require, at least, one member in it conversant with each of the important branches of the establishment. The drawing up all the rules and regulations for each branch of the service; the examination of all the officers below the rank of masters commandant for appointments or promotion; the adopting models, for vessels of war to be created from; the planning and arranging their internal apartments; the external equipment and armament; the arranging the proper stores for a given time for each department; the regulating dock yards, navy yards, foundries, &c. demand the combined talents and professional experience of men conversant with the different professions. By referring to my letter of the 20th of January, 1813, to the honorable Langdon Cheves, you will observe by the plan of a board there proposed that I had those objects in view, and therefore constituted it of such characters and professions as are essential to give every subject submitted to them a fair and professional examination. The above duties comprise almost the whole economy of the establishment, and form a subject of the first importance to the nation.

With respect to the flotilla, it ought either to form a part of the navy, and be subject to its rules, regulations, and economy, and be under the superintendence and control generally of the Navy Department and Navy Board, or else be entirely separated therefrom.

One great source of expenditure and inconvenience to the naval service arises from the short enlistment of our seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, and the principal cause which would defeat any particular object or expedition of our marine, more so than any imagined deficiency of seamen. During part of our war with Tripoli, the crews were enlisted only for one year; the consequence was, that a ship could scarcely arrive at her station, and have time to organize her crew, before she was obliged to return and discharge them. The term of enlistment now is two years; but such is the difficulty of getting men, for the small pay and bounty allowed, compared with what they can get in other service, and the ship is so long delayed in procuring her complement, that the times of one half expire before the crew is completed. The inducements given to fill the ranks of the Army being much greater than that of the Navy, many seamen have joined it; some, from necessity, have gone into foreign service, and are even navigating the commerce of the enemy; many are in the private armed ships and privateers, owing to the exclusive advantages given them over the Navy. By this means the glory and maritime reputation of the nation is made to yield to the inglorious warfare of plunder, which deeply affects some individuals of the enemy, but makes only a small impression on the nation at large; some are locked up in the prisons of our foe, who is aware of the short period of their enlistment, and is wary enough to detain them from exchange until their term of service expires, when our Government can no longer command their services. The frequency of changing men from the ship they select to cruise in, to another, or into different service, such as the lakes and flotilla, contributes much to impede the recruiting service. When the above causes are considered, it is only wonderful that any men can be procured for our ships of war. The registering and classing of the seamen of the United States would produce much good, but the compulsory command of their services would produce much evil, and should only be resorted to in the most extreme necessity. None will serve so well as those who serve voluntarily. To this account may be placed much of our superiority over the British, which has hitherto baffled all their boasted advantages of experience, skill, and long practice.

With respect to a naval academy, the best school for the instruction of youth in the profession is the deck of a ship, presuming that none would be offered or received into the service as midshipmen whose education had not been such as to fit them for officers, and calculated for gentlemen. To derive advantage from expenditure, and induce that corps of officers to pursue their profession, in time of peace, through private service, I would allow no half pay to midshipmen, except for such term as they can produce a journal of their voyages, and certificates of the master or owner of the vessel, countersigned by the collector of the port. By this means many will be induced to pursue that calling to acquire the essential knowledge of seamanship, the properties of different species of vessels, an acquaintance and familiarity with coasts, countries, and nations; a knowledge of their marine, commerce, and fortresses; the genius of the people, and their language; which would be essential to them as officers, and important to the nation. It would enable them to form a true estimate of the requisite force for the attack of any point, place, or object, and the seasons best calculated for expeditions and enterprises, with the least hazard to themselves, when they should be called to execute the object, or plant the standard of our Union over the humbled foe.

The love of country and patriotism of the seamen of the United States stand unrivalled, or only equalled by their intrepidity and perseverance in commercial pursuits, and their valor in naval combat. We see them encountering all the horrors of the enemy's prisons, the privation of liberty and comfortable support, in preference to bearing arms against their country: impressed (during a state of peace with us) on board the British ships of war, and, by oppression, compelled to serve them against other enemies, they submitted with patience to their misfortune; but, when they heard of the war with their own country, no inducement or force could prevail on them to take arms against her. Sir, the Navy looks up to the Government, with confidence, for its fostering care, and the nation trusts that they will place this important and essential national force on a systematic and solid foundation, that it may progress to maturity by gradual and regular augmentation. Although it may present to the enemies of our country a front too formidable for them to penetrate, it never can be rendered a machine to menace the Constitution or liberties of our country; it will at all times strengthen the arm of Government, bind the Union together, protect our coast and harbors from blockade, menace, or insult, our commerce from plunder, and our citizens from the slavery and dungeons of Barbary.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient humble servant,

CHARLES STEWART.

NAVY YARD, PORTSMOUTH, Nov. 30, 1814.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 17th instant, covering a letter from the honorable the Secretary of the Navy to the Senate of the United States, dated the 17th instant, communicating his views and plan of effecting a reform in the management of the Naval Department, and requesting my opinion thereon.

I now beg leave to inform you that I have examined the letter, and am of opinion that the plans, generally, proposed by the honorable Secretary, are such as would, if carried into effect, go far towards effecting the object so much wished for, particularly as it respects the establishment of a Navy Board. It would be presumption in me to propose additions or alterations of a plan proposed by the honorable the Secretary of the Navy, with the knowledge he has of naval affairs, and the means he possesses of getting at the transactions of every branch of the establishment; I can, therefore, only say, in general terms, that I think the changes in the Navy Establishment, proposed by him, are such as will remedy many of the evils that now exist. If, however, it is not thought absolutely necessary to make the proposed changes immediately, (and it would not be thought presumption in me,) I beg leave to suggest the idea of appointing, this session, the gentlemen that are to compose the Navy Board, and let them enter immediately on the duties of that office. They, together with the honorable the Secretary of the Navy, would, before the next meeting of Congress, be able to lay before the Senate a complete system for the reform of the establishment, founded on observation and facts taken from these gentlemen collectively, that may not be known or inquired into as individuals. If I dare give an opinion, these would be my sentiments. The board would have time to examine particularly into the establishment as it now is. They would be able, some of them, to visit the different naval establishments, and inform themselves of what improvements are necessary, and how far it will be expedient to occupy all the navy yards we now have, or, rather, whether it will not be advisable to fix on some two or three establishments, as being important ones, and only improve the others for temporary purposes, such as repairing ships, or giving them an outfit when they fall in, and cannot, without risk, get to the larger establishment. In short, a board appointed immediately, and commencing on the duty of the office, would, in my opinion, as I have before stated, lay before the Government a system, with such rules and regulations for the better government of our establishment, as cannot fail to meet their approbation, and, I am sure, such as will save millions to the nation, if we are to have a navy of any magnitude.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

ISAAC HULL.

HON. WILLIAM REED,
Chairman of the Naval Committee.

NEW YORK, December 1, 1814.

SIR: Circumstances have prevented me from replying, until now, to your letter accompanying the report of the Secretary of the Navy, on the subject of a new organization of that department. The objects of reform contemplated in that report being those on which I had heretofore communicated my ideas, I shall merely remark, in compliance with your request, upon the only subject which remains, namely, the organization of one board of inspectors, as recommended by the Secretary.

It appears to be the intention of that officer, that the board is to be so constituted as simply to exercise such powers as may be delegated to them by the Secretary of the Navy, and approved by the President of the United States, and that it is not to be located at the seat of Government.

After having maturely considered the subject in every point of view that presented itself to my mind, it appears to me that the object contemplated would be attained much more effectually, by so constituting this board, that the Secretary of the Navy should be its presiding officer, and the members his counsellors, with whom he might and would be expected to consult, in all those affairs which they would be supposed, from their professional experience, to be better acquainted with than himself: I say better acquainted, because it is presumed that the Secretary will not, generally, be a person thoroughly versed in the details of the service. The members of the board thus constituted, might, in addition to the duties of counsellors, exercise the respective powers contemplated in the report, and as effectually execute the duties of inspectors and controllers of abuses as if they formed a separate and distinct establishment, placed in a central part of the United States, and having their separate districts particularly defined.

By this arrangement, the Secretary of the Navy might, at all times, and at the instant, have the advice of one or more competent officers, responsible for their counsel and conduct, and with whom he could at all times consult, without incurring the delay which would result from placing the board at a distance from its head. There is always an advantage in hearing and comparing the different opinions of experienced men on every subject. Letters must, of necessity, be less particular and explanatory than verbal communications, and it is much more easy to come at the whole truth by the latter medium.

In short, sir, I can conceive no advantages that can result from placing this board in a central situation, that will counterbalance the probable disadvantages of the arrangement contemplated in the report of the Secretary. One principal object of this arrangement appears to me, ought to be to bring into the Department the experience and activity of a number of professional men, who should be at all times ready on the spot, to furnish either Congress or the Secretary with such information as either might call for, and which their professional experience enable them to communicate.

The board, with the exception of the Secretary of the Navy, should consist of naval officers exclusively, of a grade not inferior to Post Captains, and composed of not more than three in number, as that would, I think, be fully competent to the discharge of all the duties required. A greater number might tend rather to embarrass and retard, and would take from the navy officers that, on some occasions, could not be spared from the service; these officers to be selected by the President of the United States, and changed as he should find it expedient. The accountant and clerks of the Navy Department to remain, as heretofore, under the Secretary of the Navy, who should be the only disbursing officer of the board; the great duty of this board to consist in forming, arranging, and bringing into operation, a system of order and economy for the Navy, which would remedy the defects and abuses now existing in that Department. A board thus constituted would, I feel satisfied, reduce the expenses of the establishment at least one-fourth.

I am, with much respect, sir, &c.

STEPHEN DECATUR.

The above accords entirely with our opinion.

NAVY YARD, BROOKLYN, Dec. 6, 1814.

SIR: In compliance with the request of the committee appointed by the House of Representatives to inquire "into the expediency and practicability of reform in the management of the Navy Department of the United States," I have examined attentively the letter from the Secretary of the Navy, which you did me the honor to transmit me; and my sentiments on the subjects it embraces, with such remarks as appear to me of weight, and applicable to those subjects, are respectfully submitted.

In examining the plan proposed by the Secretary, I am at a loss to discover clearly his views of the duties and powers that are to remain with the Secretary of the Navy, after the board he has recommended is in full operation. I assume it is admitted that the duties and powers of that office are loosely defined now, and I consider it very important, if the office is continued with a board, that the extent of its operations should be clearly marked; if this is done, I believe the officer holding must possess but a small share of power, and his duties be very limited, or he must combine in himself the authority to direct and control the board in all cases.

It will be considered scarcely worth while, I presume, to retain it for unimportant purposes; but if it be clothed with the extensive powers alluded to, it appears to me that ill consequences may easily arise from it, because the judgment of an individual, who it does not appear must necessarily be conversant with naval affairs, may, and might, frequently, be placed in competition with that of a board of five, who are selected expressly for their knowledge in those matters, and with power to reject, modify, or render useless their most important decisions. This power, I am persuaded, should be held by the President of the United States alone.

It is true, I believe, that with special and limited authority vested by an act of Congress, which would clearly define the powers and duties of the office, some benefit might be derived from it. I am decidedly of opinion that the Navy should be represented in the Cabinet, if I may use the expression, and the office would most probably be of advantage for that purpose; but then, if there is a board created as recommended, it appears to me that the Secretary of the Navy should be more the advocate of that board than the controller of it; he might also be serviceable as the organ of communication between the President of the United States and the board, and between the latter and Congress, but there I think his labors should cease.

He should have no absolute control, over either the civil or military department of the establishment. In the light, therefore, in which I view the subject, it is manifest to me that the benefits to be derived from the office, limited as above stated, would be of little importance, and could all be executed with equal advantage if it had no existence; but if it is to exist, with all the qualities of a directing and controlling power, I am of opinion that the service would be much benefitted by the alteration of the second section proposed, so as to constitute a board of three, to be selected from the Captains of the Navy, and located at the Seat of Government. These would, most probably, be competent to the discharge of all the duties that would devolve on a board of this nature, under any circumstances that could arise, until our navy is considerably increased, when, it is to be presumed, the number of members could be increased from the same materials.

I am averse to the introduction of gentlemen into a board of this description, that have lived principally in the merchants' service, who, however well they might be skilled in the duties devolving on mariners in general, cannot, I conceive, without distending the imagination, be supposed to be acquainted with the ramifications of a naval service, and who would, most probably, from these circumstances, rather retard and embarrass than be of advantage to it. If it is considered necessary to introduce other than naval officers in this board, I would greatly prefer their being selected from other classes of citizens, possessing sound judgment and extensive information, without regard to maritime qualifications. There are duties, perhaps, that would be allotted to a board of this nature, which gentlemen possessing those qualities could execute with advantage.

On the proposition to authorize the President to appoint a naval constructor, with assistants, I will only trouble the committee by observing, that an able naval architect could, I believe, be employed to advantage in the Department; but I am of opinion that more importance is proposed to be given to the office than is necessary or advisable, and this officer should be under the direction of the board.

The appointment of a paymaster, as proposed, would not, as far as I am enabled to judge, be attended with advantage to the service. It appears to me that a well regulated system to govern the pursers, which it should be the duties of the board to prescribe, and the accountant's office as it now exists, is all that is necessary on this subject.

JANUARY, 1815.

The Naval Establishment.

H. OF R.

The establishment of a naval academy, as recommended, would unquestionably be productive of great advantage to the service. A well regulated establishment of this nature I consider to be much wanted.

These comprise all the objects that the Secretary deems it necessary for the Legislature to provide. I am of opinion, however, that there would be advantages obtained by extending the law so as to define, as clearly as possible, the duties and powers of the board, and to designate the boundaries of the naval districts.

All the regulations recommended I believe to be necessary, and much wanted, but I am of opinion that the appointment of pursers had better be limited by law, and the distribution of the duties of the board would, most probably, be made with more advantage by the members of it.

Upon the whole, it is my opinion that the duties and powers of the Secretary of the Navy, as they now exist, and all the duties and powers that it is necessary should be invested in a Navy Department, would be most advantageously settled in a board, to consist of five members and a secretary; one to be selected by the President, for his abilities as a statesman, who should preside at the board, and the remaining four to be selected by the same authority from the officers of the Navy. This plan would, I believe, combine all the qualities that are wanting to compose a Navy Department, fundamentally efficient for the administration of a permanent and extensive naval establishment.

I have the honor to be, &c.

PORTSMOUTH, N. H., Dec. 9, 1814.

SIR: Your circular of November 17th, covering a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to the Senate of the United States, I had the honor to receive a few days since.

The appointment of a board for the assistance of the Secretary of the Navy has long been advocated by the different commanders in service, upon the presumption that, with their advice and assistance, the naval force might be rendered much more efficient, without an increased expense to the country. I should, however, suppose three persons sufficient, at this time, for the performance of all the duties of such a board. I cannot but think that part of the plan, authorizing the President to appoint the presiding officer, as unnecessary, or improper, since no other rule of precedence can be established among officers than that of rank. I should also presume, that the naval officers possess that information on general naval subjects, and the particular details of service, which render them more peculiarly qualified for the duties of this board than persons whose attention has been generally devoted to other subjects.

The different duties assigned to the particular members of the board, as classed by the Secretary, I should presume might be more advantageously distributed by the advice of the board itself, after its organization. The appointment of a naval constructor would be attended with many advantages. That of paymaster, I should think unnecessary at present.

Anxious for the establishment of a board, composed of men whose vigilance and professional talents would enable them to discover and correct abuses; to furnish all the information which might be required upon naval affairs; and to superintend the general police, and all those details of service which have hitherto necessarily interfered with the more important duties of the Secretary, I am particularly gratified that it has been officially recommended, at a time when the Legislature are endeavoring to discover and reform the existing abuses of the naval establishment. The advantages which will naturally result from it appear too obvious to require enumeration; but not the least important would be the information they could soon furnish the honorable committee of naval reform, upon the different subjects of their present inquiries.

With sincere respect, I have the honor, &c.

FRIGATE UNITED STATES, Dec. 9, 1814.

SIR: A few days since I had the honor to receive your circular of the 17th ultimo, enclosing a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a report relative to the better organization of the Department of the Navy of the United States.

From long experience, and so far as my knowledge extends of naval transactions, and to naval regulations, it has been but too obvious that many imperfections have existed in the civil administration of our establishment, and that the only and best method that can be devised to remove the evil, will be to select, by law, a naval board, to consist of three Post Captains, (or of a higher grade, if there should be such,) and that the Secretary of the Navy, where it may be deemed necessary, in joint council to be the presiding officer. This board of inspection, if well selected, I am perfectly satisfied will be enabled to give to our establishment a tone satisfactory in effect, and salutary in its operation. It will be to our navy its sheet anchor; all points of duty will be equally made explicit by its salutary and well-defined regulations, and all untoward and unnecessary expenses, which have but too long continued to exist in our establishment, will, in a great measure, be brought to a final determination. When that object be obtained, the navy cannot do otherwise than progress, under the fostering care which, it is hoped, the Executive of the country will feel disposed to appreciate agreeably to its consequences.

I have the honor to be, &c.

NAVY YARD, WASHINGTON, Dec. 10, 1814.

SIR: I have been honored with your letter of the 26th ultimo, as Chairman of a committee of the House of Representatives, for "inquiring into the expediency and practicability of a reform in the Naval Department of the United States; transmitting therewith a letter from the late "Secretary of the Navy, of 15th November, to the Senate, communicating his views and plans for effecting this object," and requesting my opinion, &c., of the plan proposed.

H. OF R.

The Naval Establishment.

JANUARY, 1815.

I have perused with attention the said "report" to the Senate, and now proceed to give you my opinion on the several parts thereof, as the nature of the subject appears to me to require.

It has been long evident to every experienced officer in our navy, and experience has made it known to the community at large, that no one man, (whatever his intellectual powers and endowments may be) is fully competent to execute the multiplicity of complex duties which have been incumbent on the Head of the Navy Department.

Thus, then, another branch of power in that Department appears to have become indispensably necessary, and none so appropriate, in my opinion, as a board of three or more experienced, practical, professional men.

Whether the appellation given to the board, in the report of Mr. Jones, is the most appropriate, it is considered unnecessary herein to discuss; but it is incontrovertibly demonstrable that such a board, with proper powers, under an act of the Legislature, will effect a saving of many thousand dollars annually, in the expenses of our Naval Establishment.

The Secretary having presented his report in the form of "a bill," it may, I conceive, be found convenient to the committee, as well as to myself, to follow its sections in their regular course, with such a fair and candid opinion thereon, as their propositions appear more or less forcible and conclusive on my mind.

The first section, being totally indefinite and prospective, appears to be susceptible of no comment.

In the adoption of the second section, for the organization of the board, I conceive particular care should be taken to avoid any probable cause for disunion in its members. I would, therefore, respectfully advise that the presiding member be designated by law, and not embarrass the President of the United States with the selection, which, from resignation, death, or other casualty, may very frequently occur; it appears to me more eligible, therefore, that the law should enact that the senior navy officer of the board should be the presiding member; and, being once so established, should continue so to act as long as he remains a member thereof, notwithstanding any changes that might thereafter take place by the supply of vacancies.

The board conjointly should have the power to nominate one or more persons qualified for the duties of the secretary thereof, and submit such nominations to the President of the United States for his selection and approval.

A quorum of the board, or at least the presiding member and its secretary, should reside at the Seat of Government of the United States, for the great convenience of frequent communications and conferences with the Secretary of the Navy, or with the President of the United States, in cases of particular importance. The board should hold its regular stated meetings in its office at the Seat of Government, unless, on emergency, or some important occasion, the Secretary of the Navy may deem it more eligible to be held elsewhere.

The duties of the secretary of the board are clearly and amply defined in the "report," as well as is also the powers of the board for the establishment of its rules, and the regulations of its proceedings, &c.

The third section appears to require some elucidation respecting the contemplated time or times for holding "each stated meeting" of the board; as this section states that an abstract of the transactions of each such meeting shall be "transmitted monthly to the Secretary of the Navy," &c. Now, the transmission of such "abstracts," monthly, would necessitate an almost perpetual session of the board, and perhaps such continued sitting of a quorum thereof might be found imperative, especially in time of war; but, otherwise, it is respectfully conceived that, after the first complete organization of the board, once in two or three months will be sufficient for general stated meetings, and transmission of the transactions thereof to the Secretary of the Navy, thus affording time for a part of the members to visit personally the several naval stations, which I conceive to be one of the most essential points of their duty. And if, as heretofore suggested, a quorum of the board, or at least the presiding member, and the secretary thereof, reside at and hold their office at the Seat of Government, the other members will be better enabled to inspect the proceedings at the different naval stations, or the equipment of any squadron or single ship, (if deemed necessary,) and report daily, or otherwise, as may appear requisite, by correspondence, to the president of the board, or those executing the duties of the board at the Seat of Government, who can immediately confer thereon with the Secretary of the Navy, or the President of the United States, if deemed essential, and thus a judgment may be formed whether or not it may be expedient for the presiding member to convene the board earlier than the next approaching general stated meeting, or at any other port or place than their permanent office. Thus, also, by this constant correspondence, the president of the board, with the aid of the secretary, will always have the business necessary for the consideration of the board methodically arranged, and ready to lay before them immediately on their meeting.

On the fourth section I would only observe that, in my opinion, it would be more eligible that the board, contemplated in the "report," should "prepare such rules and regulations, for conducting the business of the Constructor's department, as shall appear proper and necessary," and submit them for the approval of the President of the United States, through the Secretary of the Navy.

The fifth section, appointing a "paymaster" of the Navy, it is believed, will be productive of great saving in the appropriation to which that office applies, and lessen in a great degree the risk of misapplication or long retention of the moneys appertaining thereto.

The sixth section is believed to be very just and proper.

The seventh section is respectfully submitted to the wisdom and judgment of the committee. Its provisions are, however, considered as adequate and equitable, but it is nevertheless conceived that the travelling expenses of the members, while on duty, should be provided for.

It is firmly believed that a naval academy will have an amply beneficial effect on the Naval Establishment, and tend to preclude the probability of public ships and vessels falling under the management of incompetent uninformed men.

"The powers and duties of the board" are, I conceive, amply illustrated and defined in the "report," except that, immediately following the first general regulation, it might be proper and highly useful to add, that no officer, whatever his grade may be, shall in anywise alter the internal or external equipments or arrangements of the ship or vessel under his command, or to which he may be in any manner attached, under pain of —; but, on perceiving that any eligible improvement may be made in any particular whatever, he shall, as speedily as practicable, submit his ideas of such improvement to the board, with his reasons therefor, for their decision.

The latitude that has been practised, in this respect, has cost the Naval Establishment many thousands of dollars.

In addition to the form of the bill, I would respectfully suggest the following :

And be it further enacted, &c., That, from and after the passing of this act, no person shall be commissioned as a lieutenant in the Navy of the United States, until he shall have attained the full age of — years, shall have been full five years in sea service, two of which at least he shall have served in the capacity of midshipman, master's mate, or sailing master, in the Navy of the United States; and shall have and produce a certificate of his abilities (after a full examination before a court of competent officers) to manage and conduct the duties of a ship-of-war, in ballasting and stowing the hold, masting, rigging, docking, careening, arming, and exercising the great guns and small arms; shall be capable of working a ship at sea, under all the forms and variety of sailing; making and taking in sail, anchoring, and getting under way; mooring and unmooring, and laying at single anchor in a tides-way, and in still water; shall be competently skilled in mathematical navigation, to conduct a ship to pilot water, on any known coast, island, bay, river, or harbor, in the world.

All which is respectfully submitted.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS TINGEY.

HON. WILLIAM REED,
Chairman of the Committee, &c.

Mr. REED, then reported a bill to alter and amend the several acts for establishing a Navy Department, by adding thereto a Board of Commissioners; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REED, also reported a bill directing the manner of contracts and purchases in the Navy Department, and for promoting economy therein; which was read and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

INTERCOURSE WITH THE ENEMY.

The bill which was read a third time on Saturday, and then laid on the table, was taken up; and the question being stated—"Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. FARNOW assigned, in a few words, the reasons which obliged him to vote against this bill, though he was in favor of its object. His principal objection was, to that part of the bill which gives power to collectors to appoint inspectors, to be considered as officers of the Government.

When Mr. F. sat down, the question was taken, without further debate, and decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

So the bill was passed.

TUESDAY, January 10.

Mr. EPPES, from the managers on the part of this House at the conference on the disagreeing votes on the amendments depending to the bill "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on various goods, wares, and merchandise, manufactured within the United States," made a report; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the estimates of appropriations necessary for the service of the year. The letter was read, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The bill from the Senate to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be constructed certain floating batteries for the defence of the United States, was twice read, and referred to the Naval Committee. [This bill appropriates $500,000, in addition to the sum heretofore appropriated for that object.]

The engrossed bill for the relief of Jacob Shinnick, Schultz, and Vogeler, Christian Chapman, and the legal representatives of John Calef, deceased, (whose property was destroyed by our officers on the approach of the enemy to Baltimore in August last,) was read a third time, and passed.

The engrossed bill for the relief of James Doyle (compensating him for services rendered at the instance of a United States officer in North Carolina, in apprehending counterfeiters of the paper of the late Bank of the United States) was read a third time. This bill was opposed by Mr. FISK, of New York, and advocated by Mr. YANCEY, and Mr. KING, of Massachusetts. The division on the passage of the bill was, 62 yeas, 40 nays.

Robinson and others, was read a third time, and passed.

The engrossed bill for the relief of William H. Washington, was read a third time (making compensation for a house destroyed by the officers of the United States during the invasion of this district in August last,) which was read a third time and passed.

SUNDAY MAILS.

Mr. FARROW presented a petition from sundry inhabitants of Chester district, South Carolina, remonstrating against the transportation and opening the mail on the Sabbath, which he moved might be committed to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. F. said there had been eighty-five petitions on this subject before Congress this session, all of which had been referred to the Postmaster General. Since the first has been so referred, it has been about three months, on which there has been no report made to Congress. I am not, said Mr. F., about to charge that high officer with a neglect of duty, but have stated those facts for a very different purpose. It is for the purpose to inquire whether Congress have properly and Constitutionally discharged their duty in respect to those petitions. I contend that they ought to have been referred to the committee to which I have moved this, or to a select committee. To prove this position, I will first draw your attention to the first amendment of the Constitution, page twenty-five. Mr. F. read—"Congress shall make 'no law respecting an establishment of religion, 'or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the 'right of the people peaceably to assemble, and 'to petition the Government for a redress of 'grievances."

The rule or order of the day, page 31, makes it the duty of the Speaker every morning to call on the members of the several States to present any petitions that they may be charged with. As the Constitution permits the people to petition you, and the order of the day is to hear them, this does imply an engagement on the part of Congress, that they will redress the complaints of the people or state to them the reason why you reject them. You are the body petitioned, not the Postmaster General, as you are their representatives, and not him. To prove to you that this petition ought to be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, I must bring to your view the standing rule of this House. [Here he read from page 37.] "It shall 'be the duty of the Committee on Post Offices and 'Post Roads to take into consideration all such 'petitions, and matters, or things, touching the 'post office and post roads, as shall be presented or 'may come in question, and be referred to them 'by the House, and to report their opinion thereon, 'together with such propositions relative thereto, 'as to them shall seem expedient." There is no rule that authorizes the House to send a petition of the description of the one before you, to the Postmaster General, notwithstanding you have given that direction to eighty-five this session. I believe that they have been thus disposed of in order that the House may not be further troubled with them, which appears to be very well understood by the Postmaster General. Is it, Mr. Speaker, that the subject is not of sufficient importance that you refuse to give those petitions the ordinary and usual course of all other petitions addressed to you? I acknowledge that the scheme contemplated by those petitions is not sanctioned by any law or practice in this Government, or any country or State in Europe. You boast that this is the only free and happy nation—your petitioners wish to add another jewel in your crown, not less bright than the other—that yours is the only virtuous and Sabbath observing nation. You have set apart the day after to-morrow to be spent throughout the Union in prayer. By your laws, and the rules of the Postmaster General to carry the same into execution, you command many thousands of your citizens, with their horses, to be laboriously employed each and every hour of the day on the next Sabbath, and to spend every Sabbath in the year in the same way. It appears to me that you might as well suspend either the one practice or the other, (stop praying or violating the Sabbath,) unless you are of the opinion that by those laws and rules that you have enacted, you have the power to repeal that decretal order of Heaven that commands you "to keep holy the Sabbath day." You are the best judge of your repealing powers on that subject. It is stated, and so contended, by the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. POTTER,) that it is the work of necessity to carry and open the mail on the Sabbath. He further observed, that if you prevented the opening of the mail on the Sabbath, it would occasion more sin to be committed, as the people would attend at the post offices, and while impatiently waiting there for their letters and papers, by being debarred from obtaining them. I should suppose that if you pass a law to prohibit the carrying or opening the mail on that day, that as your law would be public it would be known to all, therefore they would not go or send to the post offices on that day, as they would know that the mails could not be opened—the postmasters themselves would not attend. In favor of a long-established favorite, national, sinful practice, I know that many excuses and reasons can be given in favor of the continuance of it—but if none better can be given than what that learned gentleman assigned, the Lord have mercy on us!

On great national occurrences, it is now the practice, and properly so, to employ expresses; they are not carried by mails, and it is expedient that they should travel as well on the Sabbath as on other days. But, Mr. Speaker, I am not able to see the necessity for the transportation and opening the mails on the Sabbath; and conscious of my high responsibility to God, as well as to my country, for my public acts, I am not willing to take it on myself to fly in the face of divine law. I do, therefore, most solemnly disavow and condemn the practice of the transportation and opening the mails on that holy day, believing it to be unnecessary, inadmissible and wicked.

After the motion was negatived, and the petition referred to the Postmaster General, Mr. F. offered for consideration the following resolution:

“Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Offices and Post Roads be authorized and required to examine into the propriety of submitting to the consideration of this House a law prohibiting the Postmaster General from making any contracts, in future, for the transportation or opening of the mails on the Sabbath, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.”

Mr. F. observed, that if the subject-matter of the resolution was not of sufficient importance to arrest the attention of the House, that any observations he could make would prove ineffectual.

DUTIES ON MANUFACTURES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the committee of conferees on the disagreeing votes on the manufacture tax bill. The conferees recommended that the House recede from its opposition to the tax proposed by the Senate on umbrellas. The Committee concurred in the report without debate, and reported accordingly to the House. The House took up the report.

A debate arose thereon, in which Messrs. EPPES, WRIGHT, BARBOUR, STOCKTON, and others, advocated the adoption of the report, and Messrs. OAKLEY, SHEFFEY, RHEA, FISK of New York, PICKERING, INGERSOLL of Pennsylvania, and others, opposed it.

The debate on this question turned not on the expediency of the tax, which we did not hear denied, but on the Constitutional power or right of the Senate to make such an amendment to a bill for raising revenue. The debate was able, and, being on a question never before believed to have been debated, was highly interesting. The provision of the Constitution is as follows: “All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills.” On the one hand it was contended that the Senate could not amend a bill by adding a new tax thereto, because to do so would be to originate a tax, which, it was urged, was forbidden by the spirit of the Constitution. In support of this doctrine, an argument was drawn from the practice under the British Government, where the House of Lords is not permitted so to amend such a bill. On the other hand it was urged, that the power to amend being expressly given to the Senate, forbade analogy to the practice of any other Government, whose unwritten constitution contained no such provision; that, the power of the Senate to increase or diminish a tax not being denied, the power otherwise to modify a tax followed of course; and that in a bill imposing a tax on manufactures, the Senate had an undoubted right to add to the articles enumerated, any other article which they deemed a proper subject of taxation, &c.

The question on agreeing to the report was, after a long and ingenious debate on this point, decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays—for the report 97, against it 53, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. WEDNESDAY, January 11.

Mr. RINGGOLD presented the petition of the President and Directors of the Potomac Company, praying an extension of the powers of their charter so as to allow them to dispose of mill-seats within the District of Columbia, in case the erection of mills on the same shall not be prejudicial to the navigation. The petition was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. STANFORD, of North Carolina, reported a bill to revive and continue in force the act declaring the consent of Congress to the act of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, passed the 12th of December, 1814, establishing the fees of the harbor master and health officer of the ports of Savannah and St. Mary's; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the amendments of the Senate to the volunteer bill, reported sundry amendments to the said amendments; which were agreed to. On the question to agree to the amendments of the Senate as amended, it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. McKIM, the House determined not to sit on to-morrow, it being a day assigned by the President as a day of national fasting, humiliation, and prayer.

Two Messages were received from the President of the United States, the one transmitting an account of the contingent expenses of the Government for the year past; the other, transmitting the annual report of the Director of the Mint.

LAND CLAIMS IN MISSISSIPPI.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for quieting and adjusting claims to land in the Mississippi Territory; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had made several amendments thereto.

Mr. McCoy moved that the said bill be postponed until the second Monday in March next; which motion was determined in the negative—yeas 63, nays 71, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bowen, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Clark, Clendenin, Comstock, Conard, Crawford, Crouch, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Eppes, Farrow, Findley, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Gourdin, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Hungerford, Ingham, Kennedy, Kerr, Kilbourn, King of Massachusetts, Leferts, Lyle, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Parker, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Ringgold, Roane, Sage, Seybert, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey.

NAYS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Boyd, Breckenridge, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Cooper, Cox, Creighton, Culpeper, Davenport, Duvall, Ely, Forney, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Hasbrouck, Hawkins, Henderson, Hopkins of Kentucky, Howell, Humphreys, Irwin, Jackson of Rhode Island, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Kershaw, Law, Lovett, Lowndes, Macon, Markell, McKee, Miller, Montgomery, Moseley, Nelson, Oakley, Ormsby, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Robertson, Ruggles, Schureman, Sevier, Sharp, Sheffey, Sherwood, Shipherd, Slaymaker, Smith of New York, Smith of Pennsylvania, Stockton, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Wood.

The question was then taken to concur in the amendments made by the Committee of the Whole in the first section, and was determined in the negative. The question on concurring in the amendments to the second section was stated: when the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 13.

Mr. SEYBERT presented the petition of sundry merchants and traders of Philadelphia, praying for the passage of a law establishing an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole to whom the bill on that subject is referred.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of William Arnold; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Naval Committee, reported two bills for compensating individuals, not having commissions from the United States, for prisoners and property taken from the enemy by spirited enterprise, viz: a bill concerning Matthew Guy and others, and a bill concerning Weston Jenkins and others; which were read twice, and committed.

LOST CERTIFICATES.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, made a report on the petition of Farrington Barcalow, administrator of Mary Rapelyea; which was read; when Mr. C. reported a bill for the relief of Farrington Barcalow, administrator of Mary Rapelyea; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next. The report is as follows:

That the petitioner states that the said Mary Rapelyea was possessed of two loan office certificates; that her house was consumed by fire, and with it the said certificates. He prays that they may be renewed, or some other compensation made for them.

It appears that there were issued to the said Mary Rapelyea two certificates from the loan office of New Jersey: one, No. 1,594, dated June 8, 1778, for $600; the other, No. 294, dated the same day, for $500; and that the said certificates are still outstanding and unpaid. It also appears that she made known the fact of the destruction of the said certificates shortly after it happened, which was in March, 1787, but did not advertise it in the papers until February, 1792, near five years afterwards, which she has sworn was occasioned by her ignorance of its necessity. She petitioned Congress for redress in the case, in February, 1795, and a favorable report was made thereon, but it was not finally acted on. She died in the year 1807, and in 1811 the administration of her effects was committed to the petitioner.

From the foregoing facts it appears that the claim is a just one; but it is barred by the statute of limitation, it not appearing that the claim was presented at the Treasury on or before the 1st of June, 1795, which is required by law. It also appears that the requisites of the resolve of 1780 have not been complied with, so far as to advertise the destruction immediately after it happened. The committee feel satisfied, however, that as the destruction was advertised, and as a petition was presented to Congress, and not to the Treasury, before the limited time had expired, there has been a compliance with the spirit, although not with the letter of the laws. They are, therefore, of opinion that relief ought to be granted, and report a bill for that purpose.

LAND CLAIMS IN MISSISSIPPI.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill for quieting and adjusting claims to land in the Mississippi Territory.

[This bill provides a mode of settlement of claims to lands in the Mississippi Territory, north of the 31st degree of latitude, derived from grants or patents issued by the British Government.]

Considerable debate took place on this bill today, as it had done on Wednesday, in which the bill was strenuously advocated by Mr. McKee, Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. LATTIMORE, and others, and as strenuously opposed by Mr. McCoy, Mr. WRIGHT, and others.

Land Claims in Mississippi.

H. OF R.

The question on the passage of the bill to a third reading, was decided in the negative, by a majority of one vote—For the engrossment 70, against it 71, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Cooper, Cox, Creighton, Culpeper, Davenport, Duvall, Ely, Fisk of Vermont, Forney, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Hasbrouck, Hawkins, Henderson, Hopkins of Kentucky, Howell, Hulbert, Irwin, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent of New York, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Macon, Markell, McKee, Montgomery, Moseley, Oakley, Ormsby, Pickering, Pitkin, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Robertson, Ruggles, Schureman, Sevier, Sharp, Sheffield, Sherwood, Slaymaker, Smith of New York, Stockton, Sturges, Taggart, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, and Wood.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Clark, Clendenin, Comstock, Conard, Crawford, Crouch, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of New York, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Gourdin, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Hubbard, Hungerford, Ingham, Kennedy, Kerr, King of North Carolina, Leferts, Lyle, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Nelson, Newton, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Ringgold, Roane, Sage, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Williams, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey.

So the bill was rejected.

The following is a copy of the bill on the subject of the adjustment of these claims, in the shape in which it stood when the question was taken on engrossing the same for a third reading: An Act for quieting and adjusting claims to land in the Mississippi Territory.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every person or persons claiming lands in the Mississippi Territory, north of the thirty-first degree of latitude, by virtue of any grant or patent issued by the British Government, before the 4th day of July, 1776, be, and they are hereby, authorized to file with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, all the evidence of their claim or claims, on or before the first day of November, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen. And it shall be lawful for the claimants, by themselves or their agents, to withdraw the original title papers, and all evidence relating to such claims, from the registers of the land offices within the Territory aforesaid, and which may have been filed by the claimants according to law.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of State, the Attorney General, and Commissioner of the General Land Office, be, and they are hereby authorized and empowered to examine such of the claims thus filed as extend over land granted by the United States, or actually possessed by persons whom the United States are in any manner bound to secure therein, and to decide therein according to law and equity. And it shall be the duty of the commissioners aforesaid, to proceed to examine and decide on the claims aforesaid, whenever it shall appear to them that claims to the amount of one hundred and fifty thousand acres shall have been filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in pursuance of this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the act of filing the claims aforesaid, with the Commissioner of the General Land Office in pursuance of this act, shall be considered as conclusive evidence of the acceptance by the claimants of the provisions of this act; and the decisions of the commissioners aforesaid shall be final, and shall have all the effect in law of a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, in all cases where the commissioners aforesaid shall decide in favor of the claimant, the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall issue to the claimant a certificate of confirmation, specifying the quantity of land confirmed by such decision; and it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to deliver such certificate of confirmation to the claimant, his agent, or attorney, which shall be received in lieu of, and in full compensation for, the land so claimed.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the certificates of confirmation authorized by this act, shall be received at any of the land offices of the United States, in payment for any public lands of the United States, lying within the limits of the Mississippi Territory, at rates to be established by said commissioners in said certificates, but not to exceed two dollars per acre, for every acre contained in such certificate of confirmation: Provided, That such certificates shall not be received in payment for any lands sold before the date of such certificate; nor shall any discount be allowed for prompt payment in such certificates: And provided, also, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize any British grant or patent to be read as evidence in any court of the United States, which may not be filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in pursuance of this act, and which may be barred by the provisions of any former law.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to authorize the President of the United States to raise certain companies of rangers for the defence of the frontiers of the United States. After having made some progress therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

SATURDAY, January 14.

Another member, to wit: from Delaware, HENRY M. RIDGELY, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a favorable report on the petition of Isaac Smith, and therewith a bill for the relief of Isaac Smith and G. Caldwell; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. E. also reported a bill supplementary to the act laying duties on licenses to distillers, explanatory of the provision authorizing a remission of the duty in cases of stills being burnt; which was twice read, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. E. also reported a bill to amend the act for laying taxes on household furniture, extending the time to which the first shall take effect, from the first day of February to the first of April, and the time in which the other shall be carried into effect from February to May. The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, from the Militia Committee, reported a bill to amend the act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform militia in the United States.

[This bill prescribes certain regulations for a general organization of the militia, to take place within one year from the date of its passage, under the direction of the several State Legislatures; among which is the arrangement of the militia of each State, where it has not already been done, into divisions, to consist of not less than two nor more than three brigades, having one Major General to each division; the divisions, when in field, to rank according to their numbers, the lowest number to be the highest in rank.] The bill was twice read, and committed.

Mr. KILBOURN, of Ohio, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to prepare and report to this House a bill to provide for the sale of lands of the United States, in that tract of country within the State of Ohio and district of Chillicothe, heretofore set apart for satisfying the claims of refugees from Canada and Nova Scotia.

The resolution having been modified, on the suggestion of Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, so as to authorize the committee to inquire into the expediency of such a measure, instead of making the provision peremptory, was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CANNON,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to any person who shall take up a deserter from the service of the United States, and deliver him to any commissioned officer in said service, an exemption from a draught or six months tour of duty in the service aforesaid.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to authorize the raising certain companies of mounted rangers for the defence of the frontier. The bill was reported to the House, without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. McKEE, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill regulating the sale of certain reserved sections of land in Ohio, and the bill attaching to the Canton district, in the State of Ohio, the tract of land lying between the foot of the Rapids of Miami of Lake Erie and the Western line of the Connecticut reserve. These bills were reported to the House, and severally ordered to a third reading.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the second and fourth of the amendments proposed by this House to their amendments to the bill "to authorize the President of the United States to accept the services of volunteers who may associate and organize themselves, and offer their services to the Government of the United States," and have disagreed to the residue of the said amendments.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Benjamin Wells, and others. The bill was reported with an amendment; which was read, and concurred in by the House. The bill was then laid on the table.

The message from the Senate notifying their disagreement to certain amendments of this House to the amendments of the Senate to the bill "to authorize the President of the United States to accept the services of volunteers who may associate and organize themselves, and offer their services to the Government of the United States," was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITION OF ANN HODGKINSON.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made a report on the petition of Ann Hodgkinson; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House.

The report is as follows:

That the memorialist represents that, after the declaration of war, her late husband entered on board a private armed vessel, the York of Baltimore, and was killed in an engagement with the enemy; that, after his death, she applied to the Secretary of the Navy to be placed on the pension list; her request was complied with, but only as much allowed her as is allowed the widows of common seamen in such cases. She prays that Congress would grant to her a further allowance, as her husband acted as prize-master on board the York; and states that, according to the constant usage of the privateer service, prize-masters rank with and receive the emoluments of first lieutenants. It appears that the late Secretary of the Navy gave as a reason for not allowing more to the widow, that prize-masters are unknown to the laws of the United States, and that he was not authorized to grant anything additional in consequence of that appointment. The committee are of opinion that the Secretary was correct; that the office of prize-master is generally conferred upon an experienced seaman, in whom confidence is placed, and is matter of private arrangement as to pay and emolument between the captain and such prize-master. The committee see no sufficient reason for Congress interfering in this particular case, and recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

RELIEF OF NEW MADRID.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of the inhabitants of the late county of New Madrid, in the Missouri Territory, who suffered by earthquakes. The bill was reported with several amendments; which were read, and, except one, which was disagreed to, were concurred in by the House.

The bill was then further amended; and a motion was then made, by Mr. McKIM, further to amend the bill by adding thereto the following sections:

Be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to appoint two disinterested and skillful persons to inquire into and ascertain the damage which has been done by the storm of wind, in the month of August last, to the houses and property of persons residing in the City of Washington. The persons so appointed shall return, under oath, to the President of the United States, a just estimate of the damage sustained in the cases aforesaid.

And be it further enacted, That, for the injury sustained, and the estimates reported by the persons appointed as aforesaid, the sufferers shall receive public land, to be located as is heretofore provided by this act, at the rate of two dollars per acre, as a full compensation for the injuries done as aforesaid.

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

MONDAY, January 16.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of William Tatham, praying compensation for his services for nearly twenty-five years, in the accumulation of civil, military, topographical, and public economical materials, by order of President WASHINGTON, in the year 1799.—Referred to the Secretary of War.

Mr. KILBOURN, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 28th ultimo, so much of the report of the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business as relates to the bill for the more effectual defence of the Northwestern frontier, reported a bill for the more effectual protection of the Northwestern frontier, by granting donations of land to actual settlers, and for public purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

An engrossed bill to authorize the President to raise certain companies of rangers for the defence of the frontiers of the United States, and to repeal certain acts now in force for this purpose, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill regulating the sale of certain reserved sections of land in the State of Ohio was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill attaching to the Canton district, in the State of Ohio, the tract of land lying between the foot of the rapids of the Miami of Lake Erie and the Connecticut Western reserve, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of the inhabitants of the late county of New Madrid, in the Territory of Missouri, who suffered by earthquakes, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise, and for other purposes, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same;" and the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, and on gold and silver watches," was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "giving further time to complete the surveys and obtain the patents for the lands located under Virginia resolution warrants;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The bill was read twice and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, presented the petition of sundry citizens of Boston, in Massachusetts, praying for the passage of a law establishing an uniform system of bankruptcy; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole having that subject under consideration.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, from the Military Committee, reported a recommendation that the House insist on that amendment, proposed by them, to the volunteer bill, which provides that State corps (to be accepted in pursuance of this bill into the service of the United States,) shall be received in lieu of a like number of militia, which shall at any time be required from the State which offers them; and also on the amendment which varies or extends the descriptions of rifles which the volunteers may use.

And the House determined to insist thereon, accordingly.

Mr. PEARSON, of North Carolina, from the committee to whom was recommitteed the report of the committee on the destruction of certain papers and vouchers in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, together with the Clerk's second letter in relation thereto, made a further report, which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill giving further time to the purchasers of public lands to complete their payments. The bill was reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of James Hynum next passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act for the settlement of the Yazoo claims; which occasioned considerable discussion. The Committee rose, before having gone through the same, and obtained leave to sit again.

SUNDAY MAILS.

Mr. BRADBURY, Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, and Mr. COMSTOCK, of New York presented petitions from their respective districts, remonstrating against the transportation and opening of the mail on the Sabbath; which were referred to the Postmaster general.

Mr. HOWELL, of New York, presented a petition of the like nature, which he moved to refer to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. He said he was not to be deterred from making this motion by the failure of a former attempt of the same character. It was a respect due to the petitioners, he conceived, that a report should be made on their petition, which it was not probable, having been so long delayed, would be received at the hands of the Postmaster General.

On this motion of Mr. HOWELL, there arose a smart debate, the motion being opposed and advocated by several gentlemen. The debate turned on the merits of these petitions, which were denied by Mr. RHEA, Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and Mr. WRIGHT, and upheld by Mr. HOWELL, Mr. COMSTOCK, Mr. HULBERT, and Mr. FINDLEY. In the course of the debate, it was stated by Mr. KILBOURN, that he knew that the Postmaster General did intend to report on this subject at an early day. On the one hand of this question, it was contended that this was an attempt to blend the affairs of Church and State, which had been systematically made, and industriously promoted by the circulation of petitions for signature all over the Union; and it was intimated that some political party considerations might have entered into the motives which produced them. On the other hand, it was urged that these petitions were signed by religious persons of all denominations, whose respectability, professions, and standing in life, equally entitled these petitions to a respectful hearing, &c.

The yeas and nays having been required by Mr. HOWELL on this motion, it was decided in the affirmative—for the reference proposed 81, against it 70.

Mr. CROUCH, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. KILBOURN, of Ohio, presented petitions of a like tenor with the above; which were referred.

TUESDAY, January 17.

An engrossed bill, giving further time to purchasers of public lands to complete their payments, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of the heirs of James Hynum, was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to a part of the amendments proposed by this House to their bill "to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House; and the Senate have disagreed to the other part of the amendments proposed by this House to the said bill. The Senate insist on their disagreement to the amendments insisted on by this House to the amendments of the Senate to the bill "to authorize the President of the United States to accept the services of volunteers who may associate and organize themselves, and offer their services to the Government of the United States," and ask a conference on the said amendments; to which conference they have appointed managers on their part.

Mr. COOPER, of Delaware, laid upon the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, directed to state to this House the reason why he has not made a report to this House, as directed by their resolution of the 13th October last, (calling for a report relative to the advancing of moneys by States, &c.)

SUNDAY MAILS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Postmaster General, on the several petitions which have been referred to him at the present session, remonstrating against the opening or conveyance of the mails on Sundays; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.—It is as follows:

GENERAL POST OFFICE, Jan. 16, 1815.

SIR: The Postmaster General, to whom was referred sundry memorials against the usage of transporting and opening the mails on the Sabbath, has the honor to report the following facts and observations:

The usage of transporting the mails on the Sabbath, is coeval with the Constitution of the United States; and a prohibition of that usage will be first considered.

The mail passes every day in the week from Portsmouth, New Hampshire, to Savannah, in Georgia, and from Wiscasset, in Maine, to Scodic Falls, without rest on the Sabbath. And the same practice prevails on the great route from Washington City to Ohio, Kentucky, and the Missouri Territory; and from that city to Tennessee, Mississippi Territory, and New Orleans; and from Charleston, South Carolina, to Tennessee and Kentucky; and on several other great chains of communication.

If the mail was not to move on Sunday, on the first mentioned route, it would be delayed from three to four days in passing from one extreme of the route to the other. From Washington City to St. Louis, Missouri Territory, the mail would be delayed two days. From Washington City to New Orleans, the mail would be delayed three days. From New Orleans to Boston it would be delayed from four to five days. And generally the mails would, on an average, be retarded equal to one-seventh part of the time now employed, if the mails do not move on the Sabbath.

On the smaller cross routes, the transporting of the mail has been avoided on the Sabbath, except when necessary to prevent great delays, and to preserve connexions with different routes.

In relation to opening the mails on the Sabbath, it may be noticed, that the ninth section of the "Act regulating the Post Office establishment," makes it the duty of the postmasters to attend to the duties of his office "every day" on which a mail shall arrive at his office, and at "all reasonable hours" on every day of the week. When a mail is conveyed on the Sabbath, it must be opened and exchanged at the offices which it may reach in the course of the day. This operation, at the smaller offices, occupies not more than ten or twelve minutes; in some of the larger offices, it occupies one hour; and, it is believed, does not very greatly interfere with religious exercises, as to the postmasters themselves.

The practice of "delivering" letters and newspapers on the Sabbath is of recent origin, and directed by the above quoted section, commencing in 1810. Prior to that period, no postmaster (except the postmaster at Washington City) was required to deliver letters and newspapers on the Sabbath. The "reasonable hours" were to be determined by the Postmaster General, who established the following regulations, now existing: "At post offices where the mail arrives on Sunday, the office is to be kept open, for the delivery of letters, &c., for one hour after the arrival and assorting of the mail; but in case that would interfere with the hours of public worship, then the office is to be kept open for one hour after the usual time of dissolving the meetings, for that purpose." Also, if the mail arrives at an office too late for the delivery of letters on Saturday night, the postmaster is instructed to deliver them on Sunday morning, at such early hour as not to trench upon the hours devoted to public religious exercises. If these regulations are not strictly attended to, it must be imputable to the urgency of applicants, and the complaisance of postmasters.

Yazoo Claims.

After the preceding statement, it is to be observed, that public policy, pure morality, and undefiled religion, combine in favor of a due observance of the Sabbath. Nevertheless, a nation owes to itself an exercise of the means adapted to its own preservation, and for the continuance of those very blessings which flow from such observance; and the nation must sometimes operate, by a few of its agents, even on the Sabbath; and such operation may, as in time of war, become indispensable, so that the many may enjoy an uninterrupted exercise of religion in quietude and in safety. In the present state of the nation, it may be supposed necessary, daily, to convey Governmental orders, instructions, and regulations, and to communicate and receive information. If this daily carriage of the mail be, as relates to the safety of the nation, a matter of necessity, it also becomes a work of mercy. When peace shall arrive, the necessity will greatly diminish, and it will be, at all times, a pleasure to this Department to prevent any profanation of the Sabbath, as far as relates to its official authority.

The preceding statement of facts and observations are submitted, with much respect for the memorialists, and with great deference to yourself and the honorable the House of Representatives.

RETURN J. MEIGS, JR.

Hon. SPEAKER

Of the House of Representatives.

YAZOO CLAIMS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplemental to the act for the settlement of the Yazoo claims. The question yet depending on the motion of Mr. HALL, of Georgia, to add a new section to the bill, is substantially the same as that stated below.

The motion was opposed by MESSRS. OAKLEY and WRIGHT, and advocated by MESSRS. HALL and FORSYTH, but was finally negatived.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill; and the amendments made thereto were agreed to. Among the amendments was one extending the time for filing releases, &c., to the second Monday in March.

Mr. HALL, of Georgia, renewed the motion he had made in Committee of the Whole, to add a new section to the bill, which he now varied to read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the commissioners aforesaid, having decided upon the sufficiency of the releases and assignments of individual claimants, according to the true intent and meaning of the act, entitled "An act for the indemnification of certain claimants to public lands in the Mississippi Territory," shall, in their report to the President of the United States, certify such portion of the claims of each individual claimant, as in justice should and ought to be reserved for defraying their respective proportions of all just and reasonable expenses incurred by the trustees, guaranties, or agents of the companies to which they respectively belong, and for which, by agreement entered into in writing, they are bound; which said portion shall be delivered over to said trustees, agents, or guaranties, and certificates for the residue to the individual himself, his agent, or attorney, specially authorized to receive the same.

This motion was opposed by MESSRS. OAKLEY and BARNETT, and supported by MESSRS. HALL, TELFAIR, and FORSYTH. The question on the motion was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays—For the motion 61, against it 86, as follows:

YEAS—MESSRS. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Barbour, Bard, Bines, Bowen, Brown, Caldwell, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Denoyelles, Desha, Earle, Eppes, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Gourdin, Hall, Hawes, Hawkins, Humphreys, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irwin, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Leferts, Lyle, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Ringgold, Roane, Sage, Sharp, Smith of Pennsylvania, Stanford, Strong, Tannehill, Telfair, Troup, and Udree.

NAYS—MESSRS. Avery, Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Butler, Caperton, Cannon, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Clendenin, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Dana, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Ely, Farrow, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Hanson, Hasbrouck, Henderson, Howell, Hubbard, Hulbert, Irving, Jackson of Rhode Island, Jackson of Virginia, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Macon, Markell, McKee, Miller, Moseley, Oakley, Ormsby, Parker, Pickering, Pickens, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Robertson, Ruggles, Schureman, Sherwood, Shipherd, Slaymaker, Smith of New York, Smith of Virginia, Stockton, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Taylor, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Williams, Wilson of Massachusetts, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Winter, Wood, Wright, and Yancey.

The bill, after being slightly amended, was ordered to be read a third time.

A motion was then made by Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, that the remaining orders of the day be postponed until to-morrow, in order to take up the message this morning received from the Senate, respecting their decision on the amendments to the National Bank bill; which motion was negatived by the following vote—For the motion 71, against it 73.

After refusing to take up several orders of the day, which were called up—

Mr. GHOLSON renewed the motion to postpone the remaining orders of the day until to-morrow, in order to take up the Bank bill. Whereupon,

Mr. MCKEE moved to adjourn, assigning as a reason for the motion that the hour was too late, and the House too much fatigued, to enter into a subject of so great moment.

The motion to adjourn prevailed.

WEDNESDAY, January 18.

Mr. IRVING, of New York, presented a petition from a number of merchants and others, praying for the establishment of an uniform system of bankruptcy.—Referred.

On motion of Mr. LATTIMORE,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for repairing, and keeping in repair, so much of the road leading from Nashville, in Tennessee, to Natchez, in the Mississippi Territory, as is included within the boundaries of the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations of Indians; and also, of repairing, and keeping in repair, the road leading from Fort Hawkins, in the State of Georgia, to Fort St. Stephens, in the Territory aforesaid; and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Messrs. LATTIMORE, ROBERTSON, GEDDES, WILSON of Pennsylvania, and CANNON, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. KILBOURN, of Ohio, offered for consideration the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of laying and collecting an income tax from such people of the United States as have capital vested in public or any kind of stock, or in private loans, or in any other way yielding profits to the owner; and on those who are engaged in professional or other employments, producing an annual income exceeding a certain amount which the said committee may think proper to fix; it being intended that this inquiry shall extend only to such capital or employments as are not taxed by any existing laws.

Resolved, That the said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the tax upon the income, or dividend, of the capital vested in the several banking institutions within the United States, on which a tax is now imposed by law of Congress.

On the question now to consider this resolution, the vote was as follows: For its consideration 60, against it 66.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, moved that these resolutions be printed, with a view to calling them up at some future day. He could not see, he said, why a vast mass of property, more productive than any other, not now taxed at all, should not be taxed as well as all the land, and nearly all the industry of the nation.

This motion was opposed by Mr. SEYBERT, and advocated by Mr. KILBOURN, and negatively by the following vote: For printing 66, against it 63.

PETITION OF JOSHUA PENNY.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Joshua Penny; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House.—The report is as follows:

That the petitioner states that, on the night of the 22d of August, 1813, a party of armed men, from the ship Ramiles, commanded by Commodore Hardy, forcibly entered his house, took him from his bed, and carried him by force, and entirely destitute of clothing, with the exception of his shirt, to that ship, then lying off Gardiner's bay, where he was immediately put in irons and close confinement; that he was then sent to Halifax, where he was imprisoned and badly treated till the 20th of May, 1814; that he was at that time liberated from prison, and sent to Salem, in Massachusetts, in a cartel. It is also stated by the petitioner, that while he was confined on board the ship, he received nothing for subsistence but bread and water, and that his treatment was wanton and cruel. The only cause assigned for all his punishment was, that he had once been in the employment of Commodore Decatur, as a pilot to a torpedo. The petition is not accompanied with any documents to establish the facts, but the committee have no reason to disbelieve their correctness. The petitioner asks of Congress "some compensation on account of his great and uncommon sufferings."

In common with every friend of humanity, the committee sympathize with the petitioner, while they deprecate and abhor the conduct of the enemy in such cruel and unheard-of treatment towards a citizen, not in the military or naval employment of the Government; they cannot, however, adopt the principle, that for every such violation of the usages of civilized warfare, on the part of the enemy, the Government is bound to make compensation for the injury. They view the present as one of the multiplied examples, on the part of the enemy, during the present war, of outrage known only in the history of British aggression and British warfare. The principle upon which this opinion is founded has been established in a variety of cases during the present and last session of Congress. They recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House then resumed the consideration of the message from the Senate announcing their amendments to the amendments of this House to the bill to incorporate the subscribers of the Bank of the United States of America.

The first amendment having been stated, which proposes to make the capital of the bank thirty-five millions instead of thirty millions—

Mr. McKEE, of Kentucky, expressed his hope that the amendment would not be agreed to, considering it as the keystone of all the amendments of the Senate. He could see no possible advantages to result from the addition of five millions of capital, particularly as connected with the section authorizing the stoppage of payment in specie. He could see no consequence to result from that clause, which was not disastrous and ruinous, and he therefore hoped it would not be agreed to.

Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, denied the applicability of the remarks of Mr. McKEE to the amendments of the Senate. The only question, since the Senate had agreed to expunge the condition of a permanent loan to the Government was, whether the Senate should be accommodated by increasing the capital of the bank by the addition thereto of five millions; for, in fact, the retention of the clause authorizing the suspension of specie payment was immaterial, unless that it is more expedient to incorporate such a provision at once, than yield it to the importunity of the bank hereafter. For he had no doubt, if the war continued, the bank must sooner or later suspend specie payment; even the banks of Kentucky and Ohio (where specie abounded) had at length been compelled in self-defence to stop payment of specie. The advantage to Government in the proposed amendment, Mr. H. argued, would be found in the taking out of the market so much more of the war stock, &c. Something, he contended, was due to the Senate, in the spirit of accommodation which that body had exhibited in yielding so far to the wishes of the House, as to accept the greater part of the amendments; and particularly inasmuch as, in several cases of difference with that body, the House had exhibited much pertinacity in adhering to its peculiar opinions, &c. He treated as altogether ideal the argument of danger to the existence of the Republic from the refusal to incorporate a bank. He had, he said, higher opinions of the destinies of this Government, and of its durability and ability to overcome every difficulty; opinions which gained ground by every day's experience, &c.

JANUARY, 1815.

Mr. STOCKTON, of New Jersey, rose to say, that he and those with whom he had acted, in the concessions they had made relative to the features of the bank bill, had gone as far as they could go, and further than they had originally intended, in order to conciliate with gentlemen on the other side of the House. After they had done this, it could not be expected, he said, that they should recede. He wished it, therefore, to be understood, that, while he should be happy to pay all due respect to the other branch of the Legislature, it could not be expected that they should yield up to them their honest convictions; and therefore that they could not yield their assent to the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, made a speech of some length expressive of his hope that a spirit of accommodation would have induced the House at once to have acceded to the amendments of the Senate, which he deemed advantageous. He considered it particularly important that a provision should exist to prevent the agents or friends of the enemy from drawing all its specie from the vaults of the bank. The state of war he considered as changing essentially the usual state of mercantile operations, and requiring from the banks a suspension of payments in specie. He concluded his speech with the following quotations from legal authorities: "Inter arma leges silent," "Necessitas non habet legem."

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, after remarking that he felt not at all encumbered by the stipulations of compromise, inasmuch as he was not a party to it, having voted against the bill, proceeded to assign the reason why he should vote for this amendment. He found himself obliged to do so from a regard to his own consistency; for, though he doubted of the efficacy of any bank that could be established, he was pretty certain that the plan of the bank would be improved by the addition to its capital proposed by the Senate.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, advocated at some length the adoption of the amendments of the Senate. He believed the addition of five millions to the capital of the bank would operate as a benefit to the Government, by taking so much of the stock out of the market, &c. He denied the necessity, or even the propriety of any part of the House sacrificing their views of the national interest in any ideas of compromise or conciliation. At least, he disclaimed, for himself, the operation of any such consideration on him.

Mr. CUTHBERT, of Georgia, made a speech of some length against the amendments of the Senate. He considered them as inseparably connected with each other, and being so, he was altogether opposed to them. To the amendment now under consideration he was particularly opposed, because by extending the quantity of war stock to be purchased, the ability to purchase Treasury notes would be so far diminished, and the immediate benefits to the Government so far curtailed. Mr. C. also dwelt with some emphasis on the propriety of carrying into effect in good faith the compromise, by the aid of which the bill had passed this House in the form in which it had been returned to the Senate, &c.

Mr. FORSYTH denied the operation on him of the compromises alleged to have taken place in regard to this question. He was no party to it, and was ignorant of its terms. If the agreement had been in writing, he should like to see the names signed to it; to know who it was that was willing to bind the solid interests of the country as a propitiatory sacrifice on the altar of conciliation.

Considerable further debate took place on this amendment, in the course of which Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, Mr. TELFAIR, of Georgia, Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, and Mr. ALSTON, of North Carolina, denied the authority of the compromise alleged to have taken place on a former occasion, which was on the other hand asserted by Mr. CUTHBERT and Mr. OAKLEY, and incidentally by Mr. MCKEE. The first named gentlemen supported the amendment, and the latter opposed the amendment. Mr. HAWKINS, in the course of his speech, took occasion to pay a high tribute to the talents and independence of the present Secretary of the Treasury, of which he challenged a denial.

Mr. FORSYTH, in conclusion of the debate, by way of disproving the obligation of the Republican to conciliate the Federal side of the House on any question affecting the National Bank, quoted the yeas and nays on the question of reconsideration of the bill, (after it had been rejected by the casting vote of the Speaker,) from which it appeared that of the fifty-four who voted against reconsideration, but six belonged to the Republican side of the House.

The question on concurrence in the first amendment of the Senate was finally decided in the negative by yeas and nays. For the amendment 80, against it 87, as follows:

The other material amendments were also disagreed to, after debate.

Among others, was the amendment going to reinstate the payment in the specie suspending section, on which the vote was—for reinstating 80, against it 85.

So the House refused to reinstate that section.

The House, after agreeing to some trivial amendments, determined to insist on those of their amendments to which the Senate had disagreed.

THURSDAY, January 19.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of Benjamin Wells, and others; and it was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

MR. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Amy Dardin, made a detailed report thereon, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of the heirs of David Dardin, deceased; which was twice read and committed.

The bill from the Senate, supplementary to the act passed at the last session for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory, was read the third time as amended, and passed.

The bill for the better regulation of the Ordnance department, and the bill for the relief of James Brahany, passed through the Committee of the Whole, and were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to alter and amend the several acts establishing a Navy Department, by adding thereto a Board of Commissioners, went through a Committee of the Whole; and, after being amended, was, on motion of Mr. FORSYTH, postponed till to-morrow.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the select committee on the letter of Patrick Magruder, Clerk of this House, touching the destruction, by the hands of the enemy, of the vouchers, for the contingent expenditures of his office; and, after considerable debate, the resolution reported by the committee was amended so as to read as follows, and then agreed to by the House, viz:

Resolved, That Patrick Magruder, Clerk of the House of Representatives, be credited at the proper office in the Treasury Department for the sum of $30,668 78, and such further sums as he shall exhibit satisfactory evidence of having properly paid for expenditures on account of the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives since his last settlement; and that a copy of this and the former report of the committee be filed in the Auditor's office.

FRIDAY, January 20.

MR. RHEA, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom were referred sundry petitions and memorials remonstrating against the usage of transporting the mail on the Sabbath, and the report of the Postmaster General relating thereto, made a report; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next. The report is as follows:

"That they have had the same under consideration, and deeming it of great national importance, particularly in time of war, that no delay should attend the transportation of the mail, they deem it inexpedient to interfere with the present arrangements of the Post Office Establishment; and, therefore, submit the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is inexpedient to grant the prayer of the petitioners."

MR. RHEA, from the same committee, reported a bill in addition to the act regulating the Post Office Establishment; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

MR. MCKEE, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported to the House the Senate's bill giving further time to complete the surveys, and obtain patents for lands located under Virginia Revolutionary land warrants; which was twice read and committed.

MR. TROUP, from the committee of conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes on the volunteer bill, made a report thereon, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to alter and amend the several acts for establishing a Navy Department by adding thereto a Board of Commissioners.

MR. KING, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the bill so as to limit its duration to the continuance of the present war, which motion was negatived; and the bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

STATE OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. EPPES laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, exhibiting a view of the state of the Treasury of the United States at the close of the year 1814; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 17, 1815.

SIR: I have deemed it hitherto my duty to wait, with deference and respect, for a decision upon the measures which I had the honor to suggest to the Committee of Ways and Means on the 17th October last. But the rapid approach to the termination of the session of Congress induces me again to trespass upon your attention, earlier, perhaps, than is consistent with a satisfactory view of the situation of the Treasury, as some important plans are still under legislative discussion. I have now, however, the honor to submit to the consideration of the Committee of Ways and Means the following additional statements and propositions:

STATEMENTS.

I. Statement of the situation of the Treasury at the close of the year 1814.

1. The charges on the Treasury for 1814.

It appears, that at the close of the year 1813, there was a general balance of the appropriations for that year, remaining unsatisfied, and subject to be called for at the Treasury in the year 1814, amounting to about $8,131,313 03, and composed of the following items:

Of the appropriations for the civil department, about - - - - $390,499 07

H. OF R.

State of the Finances.

JANUARY, 1815.

Of the appropriation for the military department - - - -	2,666,230 33
Of the appropriation for naval department - - - -	3,611,240 75
Of the appropriation for the diplomatic department - - - -	253,846 62
Of the appropriation for miscellaneous services - - - -	1,209,496 26

$8,131,313 03

The annual appropriations for the year 1814, amounted to the sum of 38,003,691 28

The sum necessary to meet the engagements, in relation to the public debt, was about - - - 11,560,586 39

49,563,277 67

The gross charge on the Treasury for the year 1814, was - - - 57,694,590 70

2. The Ways and Means of the Treasury for 1814.

The gross charge upon the Treasury for the year 1814, amounting to $57,694,590 70, included, as above stated, the balance of the appropriations of 1813, remaining unsatisfied, at the close of that year. It is, therefore, proper to place to the credit of the Treasury, the outstanding revenue and resources, at the commencement of the year 1814, and these consisted of the following items:

Of cash in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1814 - - - $5,196,482 00

Of revenue received at the Treasury in the first quarter of 1814 4,236,062 28

Of revenue received in the second quarter - - 2,822,108 05

Of revenue received in the third quarter - - 2,313,183 20

Of revenue received in the fourth quarter, by estimate - - - 1,920,000 00

11,311,353 53

Of the proceeds of loans contracted for in 1813, and paid in 1814 - 3,592,665 00

Of the proceeds of Treasury notes issued under the act of 1813, and received in 1814 - - 1,070,000 00

4,662,665 00

Of the amount of the loan authorized by the act of the 24th March, 1814 25,000,000 00

Of the amount of the loan authorized by the act of 15th November, 1814 - 3,000,000 00

28,000,000 00

Of the amount of Treasury notes authorized to be issued by the act of the 4th of March, 1814 5,000,000 00

Of the amount of Treasury notes authorized to be issued by the act of December 26, 1814 - - 3,000,000 00

8,000,000 00

$57,170,500 53

From this statement, therefore, it appears

That the charges on the Treasury for 1814 amounted to - - - 57,694,590 70

That the Ways and Means of the Treasury for 1814 amounted to - 57,170,500 53

$524,090 17

And this excess of charges on the Treasury amounting to 524,090 17-100 dollars, beyond the ways and means, actually appropriated, will be payable out of the revenue, uncollected on the 31st of December, 1814. But, independent of the general view thus taken of the existing charges on the Treasury, and of the ways and means designated by law, for the service of 1814, it is necessary to present a statement of the actual receipts and disbursements for that year.

The actual receipts at the Treasury, during the year 1814, amounted to the sum of $40,007,661 53, and consisted of the following items:

The cash in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1814, amounted, as above stated to - $5,196,482 00

The revenue received at the Treasury, during the year 1814, amounted, as above stated to - 11,311,353 53

The cash received at the Treasury, in the year 1814, on account of the loans and issues of Treasury notes authorized in 1813, amounted, as above stated, to - 4,662,665 00

The cash received at the Treasury on account of the loans authorized in 1814, amounted, in the second quarter, to - 6,087,014 00

In the third quarter, to - 2,815,060 00

In the fourth quarter, by estimate, to - 2,707,810 00

11,609,881 00

The cash received at the Treasury on account of the issues of Treasury notes, authorized in 1814, amounted, in the second quarter, to 1,392,100 00

In the third quarter, to - 1,603,900 00

In the fourth quarter, to 4,231,280 00

7,227,280 00

The actual disbursements at the Treasury, during 1814, (taking a part of the fourth quarter by estimate,) amounted to the sum of $38,273,619 28, and consisted of the following payments:

For the civil department - 933,327 97

For miscellaneous services - - - 1,207,492 30

For the diplomatic department - - - 206,306 52

For the military department - - - 20,510,238 00

For the naval department 7,312,899 90

For the public debt - 8,103,354 59

38,273,619 28

The estimated balance of cash in the Treasury, on the 31st of December, 1814, being - - - 1,734,042 25

To those views however, first, of the general charges

on the Treasury, and of the ways and means designated by law, for the service of 1814; and second, of the actual receipts and disbursements at the Treasury, during that year, it is proper to add a statement of the result, showing the condition of the Treasury at the end of 1814, in relation to the unsatisfied demands, and to the unexpended ways and means.

The unsatisfied demands on the Treasury at the close of 1814, amounted to $19,420,971 42, and consisted of the balances of appropriations for the following objects:

For the civil department	-	-	$519,967 11
For miscellaneous services	-	-	1,285,682 36
For the diplomatic department	-	-	230,940 10
For the military department	-	-	9,458,898 33
For the naval department	-	-	4,468,251 72
For the public debt	-	-	3,457,231 80

19,420,971 42

The unexpended amount of the ways and means provided for 1814, was the sum of $23,396,881 25, and consisted of the following items:

Cash in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1814, estimated at 1,734,042 25

Revenue uncollected and outstanding, estimated at 4,500,000 00

Authority to borrow money and to issue Treasury Notes, not executed, or not yet productive, under acts of the 4th and 24th of March, 1814 - 8,162,839 00

Stock sent to Europe 3,000,000; under act of November 15, 1814, $3,000,000; under act of Decem. 26, 1814, $3,000,000 - 9,000,000 00

The surplus of ways and means, in reference to the service of 1814, including revenue and the unexecuted authority to borrow, and to issue Treasury notes, is therefore - 3,975,909 83

The conclusion from this statement of the situation of the Treasury at the close of 1814, under the different views which have been presented, would seem to establish, that the ways and means provided for the service of that year were considerably more than the demands on the Treasury would require. But it must always be recollected that the demands are positive and urgent; while a great portion of the ways and means rests upon a precarious foundation, Thus:

The unsatisfied demands on the Treasury for the service of 1814, positive and urgent in their nature, amount to - $19,420,971 42

The cash in the Treasury and the outstanding revenue only amount to - 6,234,042 25

13,186,929 17

And, consequently, the payment of the difference, amounting to $13,186,929 17, for the service of 1814, must depend on the success of raising money by loan, or by issues of Treasury notes, under the unexecuted authority, constituting the remaining ways and means designated for the same year.

II. Statement of the situation of the Treasury for the year 1815.

1. The charges upon the Treasury for the year 1815, as already ascertained.

The estimates for the annual appropriations amount to $40,538,889 39, consisting of the following items:

For civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous expenses	-	-	$1,979,289 39
For the military department	-	-	30,342,238 00
For the naval department	-	-	8,217,362 00

40,538,889 39

The public debt will call for a sum of $15,493,145 30, to answer the following claims:

For interest and reimbursement of stocks existing before the war, the sum of - 3,452,775 46

For interest on the funded debt created since the war - 2,922,816 72

For the interest on loans to be effected in 1815, by estimate - 1,500,000 00

For the principal and interest of the Treasury notes falling due in 1815, and on the 1st of January, 1816 - 7,617,553 12

From this view it appears, that ways and means must now be provided for an expenditure of the sum of $56,032,034 69, in the year 1815, independent of such additions as may arise from the contemplated establishment of a sinking fund, in relation to the public debt created since the war, and from any other new object of expense, which shall be authorized during the present year.

2. The Ways and Means of the Treasury for 1815.

The outstanding and uncollected revenue, at the commencement of 1815, has been considered as applicable to the payment of the unsatisfied balances of the appropriations for the preceding year; and, consequently, only such parts of the revenue as shall accrue, and be actually received at the Treasury, during 1815, can be embraced in the resources for the current service. But it also follows, from that view of the subject, that the Treasury is entitled to be credited in 1815, for the excess, in the provision of ways and means, to meet the expenditure of 1814.

This excess, consisting of cash, of outstanding revenue, and of an authority to borrow, or to issue Treasury notes, amounts, as above stated, to the sum of - $3,975,909 83

The net sum receivable into the Treasury in the year 1815, for the duties on goods imported during that year, cannot be safely estimated at a greater sum than - 1,000,000 00

The direct tax will probably give to the Treasury, during the year 1815, a sum of - 2,000,000 00

H. of R.

State of the Finances.

JANUARY, 1815.

The internal duties, old and new, and postage, on an estimate which is stated in the schedule A, will probably produce, in the year 1815, a sum of	$7,050,000 00
The sales of public lands will probably produce, in the year 1815, a sum of	1,000,000 00
The amount of incidental receipts, from miscellaneous sources, will probably be	100,000 00
	15,125,909 83

But it appears that the single item of public debt will require, in the year 1815, a sum of—$15,493,145 30

And that the revenue (independent of the excess of the authority to borrow, &c., brought from the last year's ways and means) will only be 11,150,000 00

Leaving a deficiency, in that respect alone, of 4,343,145 30

In a more general view, however, it is to be stated, that the charges upon the Treasury for the year 1815, amount to the sum of -
$56,032,034 69

That the existing sources of supply amount only to - 15,125,909 83

And that ways and means must be provided to raise the deficit of - 40,906,124 86

It will be readily seen that the estimates of the product of the direct tax, and of the new internal duties, are applicable only to the present year; and that, in every succeeding year, the amount will be greatly augmented.

It must also be repeated, that in the statements now presented, no provision is inserted for the contemplated sinking fund; nor for the payment of a considerable amount of unliquidated claims upon the Government for services and supplies; as these objects seem to require a distinct consideration.

Propositions.

I. It is respectfully proposed that provision be made to raise a sum of $40,906,124 86, in addition to the amount of the existing revenue, for the service of the year 1815—partly by taxes, partly by an issue of Treasury notes, and partly by an authority to procure money by loan.

II. It is respectfully proposed that an additional sum be raised by taxes, to the amount of $5,000,000; and that the following objects, or a selection from these objects of taxation, graduated in the amount to produce that sum, to be made equally productive, shall form the basis of the additional levy:

1. A tax upon inheritances and devises, to be paid by the heirs or devisees, may be made to produce	$900,000
2. A tax upon bequests, legacies, and statutory distribution, to be paid by the legatees or legal representatives, may be made to produce	500,000
3. An auxiliary tax upon all testamentary instruments and letters of administration, to be paid by the executors or administrators, may be made to produce	200,000
4. A tax upon legal process and proceedings in the courts of the United States,	- to be paid by the parties at the time of taking out the process, or entering the proceedings, may be made to produce	$250,000

5. A tax upon conveyances, mortgages, and leases, to be paid by the grantees, mortgagees, and lessors, may be made to produce	300,000
6. A stamp tax upon bonds, penal bills, warrants of attorney, notarial instruments, policies of insurance, all negotiable notes, protests of bills of exchange and promissory notes, bills of sale, and hypothecations of vessels, bottomry and respondentia bonds, may be made to produce	400,000
7. A tax of one dollar upon every barrel of wheaten flour, to be paid by the miller, may be made to produce	3,500,000
8. A tax upon the dividends (other than the dividends of banks,) and upon the sale and transfer of the stocks of banks, insurance companies, and other corporations, operating for profit upon a money capital, may be made to produce	600,000
9. An income tax may easily be made to produce	3,000,000

III. It is respectfully proposed that the additional sum to be raised by the specified taxes shall be appropriated as follows:

1. Towards establishing a sinking fund, in relation to the public debt, created since the war	$
2. Towards the payment of principal and interest of the Treasury notes, to be issued in the manner hereafter suggested	-
3. Towards defraying the expenses of the present year	-

Total - - - - - $

IV. It is respectfully proposed that there shall be an emission of Treasury notes, for the service of the year 1815, to the amount of $15,000,000, on the following plan:

1. The denominations of the notes shall be such as the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President, may direct.

2. The notes of the denomination of $100 and upwards shall be made payable to order, and shall bear an interest of 5 2-5 per cent. per annum.

3. The notes of a denomination less than $100, and not less than $20, shall be payable to order, and bear an interest at the same rate; or shall be payable to bearer, and bear no interest; as the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, shall direct.

4. The notes of a denomination under $20 shall be made payable to the bearer, and shall be circulated without interest.

5. The notes shall be issued, and be made payable to the Treasury only; but, any portion of them may be deposited with the loan officers of banks throughout the United States, for the purpose of being put into general circulation.

6. The holders of the Treasury notes not bearing an interest may at any time exchange them, in sums not less than $100, for certificates of public stock bearing an interest of 7 per cent. per annum, and irredeemable for twelve years from the date of the certificates respectively.

7. The notes shall be receivable in all payments of the United States, but in such cases they may be re-issued.

8. The notes shall be payable by annual instalment, according to their dates, and in the manner to be notified by the Treasury, to wit:

In 1816, the sum of, (one-fifth)	-	-	$3,000,000
In 1817, do. do.	-	-	3,000,000
In 1818, do. do.	-	-	3,000,000
In 1819, do. do.	-	-	3,000,000
In 1820, do. do.	-	-	3,000,000
Total	-	-	$15,000,000

9. The reimbursement of the notes shall be effected, according to the instalments, either by the payment of the principal and interest to the holders, or by taking out of circulation and destroying the amount of the instalment in notes which have been paid to the United States for duties, taxes, or other demands.

10. There shall be an appropriation of such a portion of the taxes, above specified, as will be adequate to the payment of the successive instalments of the notes; and the faith of the United States should be pledged to make good any deficiency.

11. There shall be no additional issue of Treasury notes, except upon a specific pledge of the same taxes, or of other competent taxes, to an amount equal to the reimbursement of the notes, according to the stipulated instalments.

V. It is respectfully proposed that authority should be given to the President to borrow the sum of $25,000,000, on the faith of the United States.

1. The loan to be accepted on the most advantageous terms that can be obtained.

2. The amount of the loan, for the payment and security of principal and interest, to be placed on the same footing as the rest of the funded debt created since the war.

If the propositions submitted to the consideration of the Committee of Ways and Means should be adopted, the Treasury will be placed on the following footing for the year 1815:

1. The ascertained demands upon the Treasury amount to	-	-	$56,032,034 69
2. The existing sources of revenue and supply will produce	$11,150,000 00
3. The excess of outstanding revenue, and of authority to borrow money and to issue Treasury notes for the service of 1814, beyond the demand, is estimated at	-	-	3,975,909 83
4. The taxes now proposed are estimated to produce, for 1815	-	-	5,000,000 00
5. The issue of Treasury notes, for the service of 1815, will produce	-	-	15,000,000 00
6. The authority to raise money by loan, for the service of 1815, extends to	-	-	25,000,000 00
			60,125,909 83

The demands on the Treasury, as above, being deducted, amounting to - 56,032,034 69

Leave a surplus of ways and means of $4,093,875 14

The surplus of ways and means, for the year 1815, will be applicable to the establishment of the contemplated Sinking Fund, and to the payment of any additional expenses that Congress may authorize.

In making the present communication, I feel, sir, that I have performed my duty to the Legislature of the country; but when I perceive that more than forty millions of dollars must be raised, for the service of the year 1815, by an appeal to public credit, through the medium of Treasury notes and loans, I am not without sensations of extreme solicitude. The unpromising state of the public credit, and the obstructed state of the circulating medium, are sufficiently known. A liberal imposition of taxes, during the session, ought to raise the public credit, were it not for counteracting causes; but it can have no effect in restoring a national circulating medium. It remains, therefore, with the wisdom of Congress to decide, whether any other means can be applied to restore the public credit, to re-establish a national circulating medium, and to facilitate the necessary anticipations of the public revenue. The humble opinion of this Department on the subject has been respectfully, though frankly, expressed on former occasions, and it remains unchanged.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

J. W. EPPES, Esq., Chairman, &c.

MONDAY, January 23.

Ordered. That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of the tallow-chandlers in Philadelphia; the brewers in the city of New York; non-resident owners of lands lying in the State of Ohio; the Paper Manufacturing Society of Pennsylvania; inhabitants of the city of New York, praying for the establishment of a National Bank; F. F. Breman; Stephen Girard; as also, from the resolution of the 4th of October last, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of allowing the proprietors of spirituous liquors distilled from domestic materials of which they are themselves the growers, to sell, without license, any quantity thereof not less than one gallon.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill granting a donation of three hundred and twenty acres of land to Anthony Shane; which was read the first time, and, on motion, the said bill was read the second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, presented the petition of sundry inhabitants of Pennsylvania, praying for the establishment of an uniform system of bankruptcy.—Referred.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to provide additional revenue for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining public credit, by laying a duty on lotteries; a bill for the relief of Saltus, Son, & Co., merchants, of the city of New York; and a bill to amend the act laying duties on retailers' licenses, for the relief of domestic manufacturers of wine, who themselves dispose of their product; the two first of which were committed, and the latter ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

OPERATION OF THE DIRECT TAX.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report on the petitions of the inhabitants of the counties of Hickman and Dickson, in the State of Tennessee; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows:

That the petitioners pray to be relieved from the unequal operation of the act imposing a direct tax. The — section of the act authorized the several State Legislatures to vary the sums imposed on the respective counties. The Legislature of the State of Tennessee passed an act, requiring the assessors of the United States, after the valuations were completed, to equalize and apportion the tax on the several counties. The Congress of the United States passed a law declaring its assent to the act of the State of Tennessee, with a proviso, declaring, "that in case the assessors should, from any circumstance, fail to make the equalization and apportionment required by the act of the State of Tennessee, that then, and in that case, the tax should be levied and collected in the form prescribed by the law of the United States, imposing a direct tax." It appears that some of the assessors performed the duties required by the act of the State of Tennessee; the assessor from the county of Murry refused to discharge the duties required by the act; in consequence of which the counties of Hickman and Dickson were deprived of the advantages derived from the equalization and apportionment, and the tax was levied and collected in conformity with the provisions of the law of the United States, declaring the assent of Congress to the act of the State of Tennessee. The petitioners state, that the refusal of the assessor to act, has subjected the county of Hickman to a tax of fifty-four cents in the hundred dollars, and the county of Dickson to a tax of forty cents, while the county of Murry, the place of residence of the assessor, is subjected to a tax of only nineteen cents in the hundred dollars. The petitioners pray, either that the equalization may be now made, or that the counties of Hickman and Dickson may be allowed a credit for the sum with which, from the conduct of the assessor, they were made chargeable. It cannot be doubted but that the conduct of the assessor produced, as stated by the petitioners, inequality in the operation of the tax on the counties of Hickman and Dickson. As, however, the State of Tennessee alone had the benefit of a partial equalization by the assessors, all the counties in all the States might, with equal justice, claim an examination of the principles on which their respective portions of the State quota have been fixed. By the direct tax bill recently passed, provision is made for an equalization of the tax; this will afford ample relief for the counties of Hickman and Dickson, against the future operation of the inequality complained of. The tax having been paid in many of the States, and the collection having progressed in all, the committee consider that it would be inexpedient to recommend any measure which might bring into question the principles on which the tax was originally imposed. The following resolution is, therefore, submitted:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

DUTY ON STILLs.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report on the petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of Connecticut, owners of stills, referred on the 2d of November, 1814; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the petition of sundry proprietors of copper stills in the State of Connecticut, submit, as a part of their report, a letter from the Commissioner of the Revenue. On a view of the facts contained in the letter, the committee unite in opinion with the Commissioner of the Revenue, that the duty recently imposed on the gallon of spirits distilled will tend, in some degree, to remedy the inequality complained of, and that it is inexpedient, at present, to vary the proportion between the duty on stills and boilers.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

REVENUE OFFICE, Nov. 25, 1814.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 23d instant, enclosing a petition from sundry inhabitants of the State of Connecticut, representing the unequal operation of the existing duty on stills and boilers.

The information in my possession does not enable me to form a decided opinion whether the present duty on stills is greater than it should be, compared with that on boilers. Several letters have been received, all of which state the advantages which the distillers will derive from recent improvements in the construction of boilers, and generally recommending an increased duty on them; but it does not satisfactorily appear that these advantages are peculiar to boilers, and that equal advantages do not attach to some stills over others, owing to the late improvements in their construction. Such is undoubtedly the variety in the forms and modes of operation of the several descriptions of vessels used in the United States for the purposes of distillation, in their productive powers, and in the expense with which they are worked, that the existing duty is relatively light on some, compared with other stills, and on some, compared with other boilers, as well as on some boilers compared with some stills. This effect, it will be perceived, is altogether independent of the duty, and is incident to the superior improvements of the one kind of vessel over the other. The boilers, it is to be added, being of recent introduction, possess, so far as applicable to them, all the improvements made in stills.

From an inspection of the whole number of licenses ascertained to have been granted in all the collection districts during the two first quarters of the present year, and in seventy districts for the third quarter, it appears that there have been granted 18,846 licenses for stills, and 542 for boilers; of which number there have been granted in the State of Connecticut, 425 for stills, and 26 for boilers.

It is certainly desirable that a just equality should characterise the duty on stills and boilers. A just equality cannot, however, require the imposition of such a duty as would tend in any way to disturb the relative benefits attendant on different descriptions of vessels which would be used independent of the existence of the duty, much less to deprive ingenuity of the stimulus to improvement which it reasonably finds in the profit that flows from such improvement.

Upon the whole, as the contemplated duty on the gallon of spirits distilled within the United States will, in some degree, overcome any inequality in the present duty, and as more experience of the operation of the present duty is required to ascertain the nature and extent of any existing inequalities, I am of the opinion that it would be inexpedient at this time to vary the proportion between the duty on stills and boilers.

I am, with great respect, &c.,

S. H. SMITH,

Commissioner of the Revenue.

Hon. JOHN W. EPPES, Chairman, &c.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, in pursuance of the resolution instructing them to inquire into the expediency of imposing a direct tax on the District of Columbia, and other Territories of the United States, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill to provide additional revenue for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the District of Columbia; which was twice read, and committed.

The report is as follows:

That the sixteenth clause of the eighth section of the Constitution declares, that Congress shall have power to "exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district of country, not exceeding ten miles square, as may, by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the Seat of the Government of the United States." No doubt can be entertained but that this general grant of legislative powers, must include the right of imposing taxes, which is among the most common and ordinary objects of legislation. Nor is it believed that the exercise of this power, so far as it respects the District of Columbia, is either prohibited or limited by any clause of the Constitution. The third clause of the second section of the Constitution, which declares "that representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States, which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons," is considered as applying exclusively to the States, and was evidently designed, so far as respects the imposition of taxes, as a substitute for the rule of apportionment fixed by the eighth Article of the Old Confederation, under which each State contributed for the common defence and general welfare, according to the value of its lands, buildings, and improvements, instead of the amount of its population. The right to tax the other Territories of the United States, appears equally clear. The fourth article of compact between the United States and the Territories, declares "the said territory and the States which may be formed therein, shall forever remain a part of this Confederacy of the United States of America, subject to the Articles of Confederation, and to such alterations therein as may be constitutionally made, and to all the acts and ordinances of the United States in Congress assembled, conformable thereto. The inhabitants and settlers in the said territory, shall be subject to pay a part of the federal debt, contracted or to be contracted, a proportional part of the expenses of Government, to be apportioned on them by Congress according to the same common rule and measure by which apportionments thereof shall be made on the other States."

On the other point referred to the committee, viz: the policy of imposing a direct tax, they have bestowed all the attention which its importance merits, in involving the principles of representation and taxation. It cannot be denied, that the imposition of taxes, by persons who owe complete responsibility to the people, is one of the best securities against the abuse of power. By the Constitution of the United States, this principle of representative responsibility was violated, so far as respects the District of Columbia, and the rights and interests of the people transferred to persons over whose election the inhabitants have no control. The only question is, whether their being placed in a peculiar situation by the Constitution, ought to operate as a permanent exemption from taxes. It is not believed that the right to tax, exercised by persons who owe no responsibility to those on whom their laws must operate, is in principle more exceptionable, than the exercise of powers which affect the personal rights, and even the life of the citizen. On these important questions, however, the Congress of the United States must legislate. No other power can, within the District of Columbia, prescribe the regulations necessary to protect the innocent and punish the guilty. In a free country, every portion of the community ought to contribute to the common defence and general welfare; nor is it believed that the framers of the Constitution intended to violate this principle, by exempting from taxes a district of country whose natural advantages are surpassed by no portion of the United States, and which derives peculiar benefits from the disbursement annually of large sums drawn from other portions of the Union.

The situation of the other Territories is materially different: at a distance from market, with a large portion of unimproved and unproductive land, they are still struggling with all the inconveniences attendant on infant settlements, surrounded by powerful tribes of hostile savages. While, therefore, no doubt can be entertained as to the Constitutional right to impose a direct tax on Territories, the committee deem it at present inexpedient, and submit a bill for imposing a direct tax on the District of Columbia.

CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, of Kentucky, the further consideration of the orders of the day was postponed until to-morrow, in order to proceed to the consideration of the resolution for the removal of Patrick Magruder from the office of Clerk of the House of Representatives, and the appointment of a successor.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the resolution offered on Saturday, by Mr. CLARK, on that subject.

A motion was made, by Mr. FISK, of Vermont, to postpone the further consideration of this motion to Monday next; which was opposed by Mr. DUVALLE, and Mr. CLARK, and supported by Mr. FISK, Mr. FARROW, and Mr. HAWKINS, when Mr. FISK withdrew his motion.

The adoption of the resolve was then opposed by Mr. WRIGHT, in a speech of full two hours in length. It was also opposed by Mr. GHOLSON and Mr. MCKIM, and supported by Mr. PEARSON, Mr. MACON, and Mr. CLARK.

Mr. MCKIM moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution to this day week.

This motion was opposed by Mr. CLARK, Mr. PEARSON, and Mr. OAKLEY, and supported by Mr. MOORE and Mr. EPPES.

The motion was finally decided at a late hour as follows: For postponement 71, against it 71.

The SPEAKER decided the question by an affirmative vote, and the further consideration of the resolution was therefore postponed to this day week.

[The foundation for this motion to oust Mr. MAGRUDER is briefly this: During the late incursion of the enemy, Mr. M. was, on account of ill-health, at the Springs, and, of course, absent from the city, leaving his office in charge of his clerks. The principal clerk being a colonel in the militia, and all the others except one called out in the militia, one of those so in service was, on the near approach of the enemy, permitted to return, and, with the remaining clerk, to attempt the salvation of the records. Many of them, and those the most valuable, were saved by being carried into the country; others, of less importance, were removed into the house formerly belonging to General Washington, which was wantonly destroyed by the enemy. Among the papers left in the Capitol were the vouchers of the contingent expenses of the past year, which, being in a small drawer, were overlooked, and irrecoverably lost in the general conflagration. Soon after the meeting of Congress, in consequence of a letter from Mr. Magruder narrating these circumstances, and inviting inquiry, a committee was appointed to investigate the matter, who reported unfavorably to the clerks as to the exertions made in saving the public papers; and also reported that, out of $50,000 received on account of contingent moneys, and all of which, except about $3,000, is alleged to have been expended, vouchers are produced for little more than $30,000 of the amount, which, or a great part of it, the committee infer has been improperly used. Whereupon, the House resolves that the Clerk shall have credit at the Treasury for all the ascertained expenditures, and such other amount as he shall produce or hereafter obtain vouchers for. It ought to be observed that the contingent fund has always been exclusively under the direction of Mr. Magruder's principal clerk, and it does not appear that Mr. M. himself had any knowledge of its disbursement, considering it as having been duly controlled by the Committee of Accounts. Under these circumstances a motion is made to remove him, on the ground of neglect in confiding these matters to his deputies; which is opposed on the ground of his unimpeachable character and general good conduct. This is believed to be an impartial statement of the case.]

The House adjourned at a late hour.

TUESDAY, January 24.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill making provision for subsisting the Army of the United States, by authorizing the appointment of commissaries of subsistence; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. TROUP, from the same committee, reported a bill to authorize the purchase of a tract of land for the use of the United States; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES,

Ordered, That General Winder have leave to withdraw the papers mentioned in the Journal of the 21st instant, by his agreeing to furnish copies thereof for the use of the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting the annual report of the Commissioners of the Navy Pension Fund.

An engrossed bill to amend the act laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise, was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM, the bill for the relief of Isaac Smith and Bratton Caldwell, passed the Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed.

The order of the day, on Mr. JACKSON's proposition to amend the Constitution, so as to give to Congress power to establish a National Bank, &c. having been called over, on motion of Mr. JACKSON the further consideration thereof was postponed indefinitely.

The bill to extend the time of Oliver Evans's patent for his improvement on steam engines, underwent considerable discussion, in Committee of the Whole, and was, after a long debate, amended, and reported to the House.

Mr. LEWIS moved further to amend the bill, by adding thereto, the following proviso:

"And provided also, That the said Oliver Evans shall not be entitled to any of the privileges granted by this act, but upon the express condition that he shall permit any person or persons to use the improvements of the said Oliver Evans in the machinery of mills for the manufacture of flour during the continuance of his extended patent therefor, upon the same terms as were demanded by the said Oliver Evans before the extension of the said patent."

The motion was negatived, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a time to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, January 25.

Mr. McKEE, of Kentucky, from the Committee of Public Lands, reported a bill to amend and extend the provisions of the act of the 16th April, 1814, entitled "an act confirming certain claims to land in the Illinois Territory, and providing for their location;" which was twice read and committed.

The engrossed bill, declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, establishing the fees of the health officer and harbor master of the ports of Savannah and St. Mary's, was read a third time.

Mr. TAYLOR moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Monday next; which motion was negatived.

On motion of Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, the further consideration of the bill was, after debate, postponed indefinitely.

The engrossed bill to authorize the purchase of a certain tract of land for the use of the United States (in the vicinity of Plattsburg) was read a third time, and passed; and sent to the Senate for concurrence therein.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Isaac Smith and Bratton Caldwell, was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate.

The bill from the Senate to extend the time of Oliver Evans's patent, for his improvement in the steam engine, was read a third time.

Mr. FISK, of New York, moved to postpone indefinitely the further consideration of the bill; which motion was decided as follows by yeas and nays: For the motion 54, against it 79.

The bill was then passed, and the concurrence of the Senate requested in the amendments made by the House thereto.

MILITIA BILL.

The House then resumed the consideration of Mr. JACKSON's bill to amend the militia law, so as to conform the organization of the militia of the several States, as far as regards the officers thereof, to that of the military force of the United States.

A motion was made by Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, to strike out the second section of the bill.

That motion was superseded by a motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, to postpone the further consideration of the bill indefinitely.

The object of the bill was advocated by Messrs. JACKSON, HAWKINS, CANNON, and others, and opposed by Messrs. WRIGHT, TAYLOR, PICKERING, WEBSTER, and others.

The arguments in favor of the bill were, generally, the dissonance arising from the dissimilarity of the provisions of the State laws for organizing the militia, to those of the laws directing the organization of the Army of the United States; and the confusion hence produced in the militia draughts, &c. The opponents of the bill contended that it would be highly inexpedient, on the other hand, to disturb the present organization of the militia, which, it was also said, was by many well-informed military men believed to be superior to the organization of the Army of the United States, &c.

The question on indefinite postponement was decided in the affirmative: For the postponement 94, against it 45, as follows:

THURSDAY January 26.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of the President and Directors of the Anacostia Bridge Company; which was read, when.

Mr. YANCEY reported a bill for the relief of the Anacostia Bridge Company; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the bill from the Senate, "to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be built, equipped, and employed, one or more floating batteries for the defence of the waters of the United States," without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole on Saturday next.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the Committee of Military Affairs was instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing or amending so much of the act for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States, as relates to the infliction of corporal punishment.

On motion of the same gentleman, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of imposing a duty on silver plate and jewelry manufactured for sale, in the hands of the manufacturer.

Mr. TAYLOR also submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the militia, be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what provision ought to be made by law for assessing, collecting, or remitting fines imposed on officers, non-commissioned officers and privates, by militia courts martial.

Mr. MCCOY, of Virginia, moved to amend this motion by adding thereto the following: "And that they inquire into the expediency of increasing the fines on such officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, for offences under the military laws;" which motion was negatived.

The motion of Mr. TAYLOR was then agreed to as moved by him.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the remainder of the copies ordered to be printed by the House of Representatives of the digest of the returns of the arts and manufactures of the United States.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of Henry Nimmo, was twice read, and committed.

PETITION OF GEORGE HITE.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, made a report on the petition of George Hite; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House.

The report is as follows:

That the petitioner asks Congress to remunerate him for a number of negroes, horses, and cattle, which, he alleges, were the property of his father; and which were taken by the Cherokee Indians in the year 1776, from his father's residence, after having first killed the whole family, except himself; some of which negroes, he states, are now in the possession of the said Indians. The petitioner is so defective in his testimony that he does not make out such a claim as can be granted. He neither shows himself to be the heir of the person, whose property is said to have been taken, nor does he show, satisfactorily, the value of the property taken, or that any was taken. But, if all these points were established, the committee still think he has no claim upon Congress. He bottoms his claim on the treaties made by the United States with these Indians in 1785 and 1795; by the first of which the Indians were bound to deliver up and restore all the property belonging to the citizens of the United States which they had taken; and by the latter they were allowed to retain all such property as still remained in their possession. There is no satisfactory evidence that any proper efforts were ever made to recover this property between the dates of these two treaties. The neglect of the petitioner to do this certainly cannot create an obligation on the Government to remunerate him. Every person who had lost a horse or a cow, by the depredations of these Indians, has an equal claim on the Government with the petitioner, and, by obtaining the remuneration asked for, would find in the Government a convenient warrantor for all their losses. This, it is believed, would not be considered good policy at this day. If there ever were an obligation created, on the part of the Government, by the neglect of the petitioner it has been destroyed; therefore,

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

JANUARY, 1815.

Mr. Jefferson's Library.

H. OF R.

MR. JEFFERSON'S LIBRARY.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the Senate authorizing the purchase of the library of Thomas Jefferson.

A motion was made by Mr. LEWIS, that the same be postponed indefinitely. For the motion 69, against it 73.

A motion was then made by Mr. COOPER, of Delaware, to postpone the further consideration of the bill to the 4th day of March next. For the motion 68, against it 74.

The question was then stated on the passage of the bill.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, moved to recommit the bill with instructions to a select committee to report a new section, authorizing the selection of such of the books belonging to said library as might be necessary or useful to Congress in their deliberations, and to dispose of the remainder at public sale. This motion was negatived—yeas 56.

Mr. KING afterwards moved to recommit the bill to a select committee, with instructions to report a new section authorizing the Library Committee, as soon as said library shall be received at Washington, to select therefrom all books of an atheistical, irreligious, and immoral tendency, if any such there be, and send the same back to Mr. Jefferson without any expense to him. This motion Mr. K. thought proper afterwards to withdraw.

This subject, and the various motions relative thereto, gave rise to a debate which lasted till the hour of adjournment; which, though it afforded much amusement to the auditors, would not interest the feelings or judgment of any reader. Those who supported the bill in debate were Messrs. WRIGHT, FISK of Vermont, RHEA of Tennessee, and HULBERT; and those who opposed it were Messrs. KING of Massachusetts, FARROW, CANNON, HANSON, GROSVENOR, PICKERING, and WEBSTER.

Those who opposed the bill, did so on account of the scarcity of money, and the necessity of appropriating it to purposes more indispensable than the purchase of a library; the probable insecurity of such a library placed here; the high price to be given for this collection; its miscellaneous and almost exclusively literary (instead of legal and historical) character, &c.

To those arguments, enforced with zeal and vehemence, the friends of the bill replied with fact, wit, and argument, to show that the purchase, to be made on terms of long credit, could not affect the present resources of the United States; that the price was moderate, the library more valuable from the scarcity of many of its books, and altogether a most admirable substratum for a National Library.

The final question on the passage of the bill was decided in the affirmative. For the passage of the bill 81, against it 71, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Barbour, Bines, Bowen, Brown, Butler, Calhoun, Chappell, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Evans, Findley, Fisk of Ver-

Mr. McKIM presented a petition of sundry merchants and other inhabitants of Baltimore, praying for the establishment of an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.—Referred.

Mr. GASTON presented a petition of the President and Directors of the College of Georgetown, praying to be invested with authority and power to confer the usual academical honours on those who, by their proficiency in the liberal arts, may be judged deserving of such distinctions.—Referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, from the Naval Committee, to whom was referred the report of the acting Secretary of the Navy on the petition of Uriah Brown, made a report unfavorable to the Government's making any experiment on this invention at the present time; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill giving the right of pre-emption in the purchase of public lands to certain settlers in the Indiana Territory; which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

The remainder of the day was spent on the bill, reported by the Committee of Claims, to authorize payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy whilst in the military service of the United States, to which sundry amendments were made in Committee of the Whole, and reported to the House.

After employing the day wholly on this bill, the House adjourned without having gone through the same.

JANUARY, 1815.

SATURDAY, January 28.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1815; which was read the first time, and, on motion, the said bill was read the second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise, and for other purposes,'" with an amendment, in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed a bill "concerning field officers of the militia;" in which bill they ask the concurrence of the House.

CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from PATRICK MAGRUDER, the Clerk to the House, resigning his situation as such; which was laid on the table.

The letter is as follows:

To the honorable SPEAKER

of the House of Representatives :

CLERK'S OFFICE, Jan. 28, 1815.

SIR: It is with a reluctance I cannot well express, that I find it necessary again to throw myself on your politeness as the medium of communication to the House, on a subject no less painful to me than it must be to them. This is imposed upon me as a duty, as well by the arguments derived from those inimical to me, (as I learn,) from silence in regard to the last report of the committee, appointed at my request to investigate the situation of the office under my charge, as by the indications afforded by the recent vote of the House. In regard to the accounts of my office, the correctness of which has been arraigned by a committee of the House, I have nothing to add to what I have said on a former occasion on this subject, except to reassert my entire innocence and ignorance of any misapplication of the public moneys, and to express my conscientious belief that the public money has been faithfully disbursed by my principal clerk, to whom it was confided, and that he will be able to account for it at the Treasury; and would have been able to do so at this day, had not the unfortunate conflagration of the Capitol destroyed his accounts, and subjected his conduct to a scrutiny, in which the fact of a deficiency of the vouchers destroyed has been adduced as evidence against him.

Could I presume so far, it might be an easy task to exhibit errors of great importance in that part of the report of the committee on my conduct, which relates to the account of the contingent fund. It is in my belief demonstrable, that its errors are not limited to hundreds, or to any moderate number of thousands of dollars. Still easier would it be to dissipate almost every argument used in debate on that report, tending by assertion or implication to prejudice the House against me personally; but, sir, he who is put upon his trial without opportunity to defend himself from accusations adduced against him, can expect no benefit from an after appeal to those who have already pronounced judgment against him.

Little, sir, did I ever expect to have to answer to this House, on charges affecting my character, at this advanced period of my life. Since I passed the age of eighteen years, have I been in public life. By those who knew me best, I have been selected to fill various public stations, judicial as well as legislative, under both State and General Governments, and no man has ever before appeared to impute to me malfeasance in the duties of my station. In every situation in which it has pleased my country to place me, I have endeavored to sustain a character more dear to me than wealth; and the attempt to rob me of a jewel more precious than life, to deprive me of that honest fame which I had acquired by a long course of public service, however it may temporarily succeed in this body, cannot eventually depress my character or standing in the eyes of the American people. Truth is great, and will prevail. I court its light, and shrink not from its test. The office of Clerk of this House, arduous and trying as are the duties to be performed during the sessions of Congress, has never been considered by me, in a pecuniary point of view, an object. Two years since I should have resigned it, but for the dissuasions of my friends. I was too proud of the honor conferred by the flattering suffrage I had received from the honorable House. I retained my seat; and how cruelly I am treated for that determination let recent events decide.

But, sir, it is not my intention to weary you or the House by reiterating those unavailing regrets which force themselves on my bosom. It is probable, sir, I might, by resorting to humiliating solicitation, reinstate myself in my former footing in the House; but there is implanted within my bosom a principle much more powerful than the love of popularity or of office. It is the sense of honor which forbids solicitation from, or even association with, those who entertain a suspicion derogatory to my fair fame. That there are such among those whom I have once been proud to call my political friends, the motion now pending in the House, and the manner in which it has been supported, sufficiently indicate. After a struggle between contending feelings, I have therefore determined to resign the office I now hold, to permit those by whom I am persecuted to attain, with greater ease, an object to which they have been willing to sacrifice, not only my family but my reputation. I beg the Speaker and House to accept of this my resignation of the office of Clerk of the House of Representatives. I take this last opportunity to offer to yourself, and the House, the homage of my unfeigned respect, and to those who have stood forth to befriend an injured man, and resisted the accusations against me, the assurances of my eternal gratitude. To my successor in office, let him be whom he may, I wish an easier and happier time in the discharge of his duties than I have had.

I am, sir, with respect,

PATRICK MAGRUDER.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, moved further to amend the bill by striking out the following words, contained in the 5th and 6th lines of the 2d section, to wit: "either by impressment or contract;" which was determined in the negative.

The bill was further amended; and a motion was made by Mr. KILBOURN, further to amend the bill by inserting, between the 11th and 12th lines of the 1st section, the following words: "or who shall have lost any horse or horses while in service as aforesaid, in consequence of the owner being killed or wounded, or his obedience to the orders of the officer commanding any expedition."

Which motion was determined in the negative.

Mr. DESHA moved further to amend the bill by adding thereto the following section:

And be it further enacted, That the mounted volunteers who served in the Northwestern expedition in the Fall of the year 1813, or in the Southern campaign against the hostile Creek Indians, commanded by Major General Jackson and General Floyd, and who lost their horses by death or otherwise, in consequence of being dismounted and separated from their horses by the orders of the Commanding General, without the default or negligence of the owner, shall be entitled to compensation therefor.

And the question thereon being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 62, nays 65, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barbour, Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Burwell, Champion, Cilley, Cox, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davenport, Franklin, Gaston, Geddes, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Grosvenor, Hale, Hanson, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Henderson, Hulbert, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kennedy, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Macon, Markell, Moseley, Oakley, Pickering, Pickens, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Ruggles, Schureman, Sherwood, Shipherd, Stanford, Sturges, Taggart, Taylor, Thompson, Troup, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Yancey.

Mr JACKSON, of Virginia, moved further to amend the said bill by inserting the following section:

And be it further enacted, That mounted men who have been, or shall hereafter be, employed in the service of the United States, and who have lost, or shall hereafter lose, their horses, by death or otherwise, without their default or negligence, in consequence of their being dismounted and separated from their horses by the orders of the commanding officer, shall be allowed and paid the value thereof.

Which was determined in the negative.

Mr. McLEAN moved further to amend the bill by inserting, after the words "United States," in the 10th line of the 1st section, the following words: "or where any horse or horses may have been surrendered to the enemy and lost to the owner by capitulation;" which was determined in the negative.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, moved further to amend the first section of the bill, by adding thereto the following words: "deducting therefrom the amount which may have accrued to the claimant for the use and risk of his horse;" which was determined in the negative.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, moved further to amend the first section, as follows:

Line 5, after the word "damage," insert "without any fault or neglect on his part."

Line 4, strike out the word "has," and insert "have."

Line 6, after the word "or," strike out the word "by," and insert "which have died, or shall hereafter die of."

And the question being taken on the said amendments, it was determined in the negative.

On motion of Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, the bill was further amended; and it was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time on Monday next.

MONDAY, January 30.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, supplementary to the act entitled "An act laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise, and for other purposes," were read, and concurred in by the House.

On motion of Mr. McKEE,

Resolved, That the Committee of Accounts be instructed to inquire into the expediency of compelling the Clerk of this House to give bond for the faithful application and disbursement of the contingent fund of this House.

The bill from the Senate, "concerning field officers of the militia," was read a second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The engrossed bill, giving a right of pre-emption in the purchase of public lands to certain settlers in the Indiana Territory, was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate.

The engrossed bill to authorize payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed, whilst in the military service of the United States, was read a third time and passed.

The bill to authorize the President of the United States to receive into the service of the United States certain corps which may be raised and organized in any State to serve in lieu of the militia thereof, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. LEWIS called up the bill for repairing or rebuilding the public buildings in this city, which the House refused to take up, 60 to 49; and also the bill to incorporate the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown; and also the bill establishing the Bank of the Metropolis; all which the House refused to take up.

The bill for the regulation of the courts of justice in the Territory of Indiana was then taken up in Committee of the Whole, on the motion of Mr. JENNINGS. After some discussion on this bill, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill in addition to the act regulating the Post Office Establishment; the bill was reported to the House, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. EPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes for the service of the year 1815; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, "in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio," in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill "to prohibit intercourse with the enemy, and for other purposes," with an amendment, in which they request the concurrence of this House.

On motion of Mr. CANNON,

Resolved, That the committee on that part of the President's Message which relates to the militia, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the act supplementary to an act, entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for those purposes, and to increase the pay of volunteer and militia corps," passed February the 2d, 1813, so as to allow to the militia, in addition to the pay and emoluments allowed by the before recited act, who now are, or may hereafter be, in the service of the United States, the same amount of clothing, in proportion to the time they are in said service, as is allowed to the regular army; and in all cases where the said militia shall furnish themselves with clothing, while in service as aforesaid, to allow them the amount of the United States' price in money in lieu thereof.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. KILBOURN:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for payment to the mounted volunteers and draughted militia, who have served in the Northwestern army, or against the Creek Indians, under the command of Generals Jackson and Floyd, of the value of the horses lost by them in the service of the United States, in either of their several expeditions, in consequence of the men being dismounted and separated from their horses, by order of their respective commanding officers, and without the fault or neglect of the owner, or in consequence of the rider or riders being killed or wounded in battle; and that the Committee of Claims be instructed to prepare and report to this House a bill accordingly.

The question was taken to consider the said resolution, and determined in the negative—yeas 43.

Mr. RUGGLES offered for consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the tax laid on stills or boilers used solely in the rectification of spirituous liquors, or on spirits rectified therein."

The House agreed to consider the resolution—54 votes to 52.

Mr. RUGGLES stated his reasons for this motion, viz: that the duty was now so high as to effectually suppress such distillation, as he was informed by letters from his district.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution, and decided in the negative—ayes 45.

The following amendment to the standing rules and orders of the House was submitted by Mr. FORSYTH; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

"After reports from select and standing committees have been called for and disposed of, motions for the reconsideration of any decision of the preceding day shall be in order, and have precedence of all other business."

"All bills, resolutions, orders, or other propositions, adopted by the House, shall be retained in its possession until the time limited for motions for reconsideration shall have expired, unless otherwise specially directed."

JOSEPH G. ROBERTS.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made a report on the petition of Joseph G. Roberts; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table. It is as follows:

The petitioner states that he is a surgeon in the Navy of the United States, and as such was attached to the squadron on Lake Erie, commanded by Commodore Perry; that whilst the squadron lay in port, the men becoming sickly, a hospital was established on shore, and the petitioner placed over it as surgeon; that whilst discharging his duty on shore the action on the lake took place, on the 10th of September, 1813, in which the whole of the enemy's squadron was captured; that some of the wounded seamen were sent to the hospital after the action; that, in dividing the prize money, such a construction has been given to the law as to exclude the petitioner from any part thereof; under which construction the whole of said prize money has been distributed among the officers and crew; the petitioner prays that Congress would grant him such a sum as will be equal to what his proportion of the said prize money would have been, had it been determined that he was entitled to a proportion thereof.

The committee are of opinion that the construction given to the law in the case stated is a correct one, and conformable to naval usage in similar cases. Prize money is allowed as a stimulus to courage and exertion in action, and a reward for valor, danger, and victory. They, therefore, recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

THOMAS RIDDELS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Navy, on the petition of Thomas Riddels; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table. It is as follows:

Navy Department, Jan. 28, 1815.

SIR: In reply to an order of the honorable the House of Representatives, of the third inst., referring the petition of Thomas Riddels, of Philadelphia, to the Commissioners of the Navy Pension Fund, I have the honor to state that Thomas Riddels was regularly shipped in the United States' service at six dollars per month wages, and was stationed on board gunboat No. 121, commanded by Sailingmaster Wm. Sheed; that, on the 29th day of July, 1813, in an action with the enemy, which took place near the entrance of the Delaware bay, the said Thomas Riddels lost his leg. After recovering from amputation, he was employed at the navy yard, Philadelphia, and on the 30th May, 1813, a pension was granted to him of three dollars per month, being the highest rate authorized by law.

There are many cases of peculiar hardship similar to this, particularly in the corps of marines, in which a man, for the greatest degree of disability, can receive no more than half his monthly pay, which heretofore has been only six dollars.

As the pension granted to this boy, Thomas Riddels, is for life, he might be bound apprentice to some profitable sedentary trade, and the accumulation of his pension, under guardianship, and proper management, may enable him to be usefully employed both for himself and the country.

All which is respectfully submitted.

B. W. CROWNINSHIELD.

The Hon. the SPEAKER

Of the House of Representatives.

ELECTION OF CLERK.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House will proceed on — at — o'clock, to the appointment of a Clerk, in the room of Patrick Magruder, who has resigned that office.

The question on filling the first blank with the word to-morrow was decided in the negative—60 to 55.

Mr. PEARSON then moved to lay the resolution on the table, with a view to introduce a motion to postpone the appointment of a Clerk until the next session, and in the meantime to appoint a Clerk temporarily. He desired time to make a selection from such candidates as should present themselves for this important office.

To this it was objected, that the office of Clerk was in itself temporary, and would require re-election at the commencement of next session.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was decided in the negative.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, moved to fill the blank with the word Wednesday; which was negatived—ayes 43.

The blanks were then filled with the words, "this day, at two o'clock."

The motion, as amended, was then agreed to.

The House afterwards proceeded to ballot for a Clerk. Messrs. Thomas Dougherty, Thomas L. McKenney, O. B. Brown, Samuel Burch, and N. B. Van Zandt, were severally nominated. On the first balloting there were—

For Mr. Dougherty	-	-	-	80
McKenney	-	-	-	35
Burch	-	-	-	19
Brown	-	-	-	13
Van Zandt	-	-	-	4
Scattering	-	-	-	6

On the second ballot Mr. Dougherty had 83 votes, and Mr. McKenney 73, and four scattering; so Mr. DOUGHERTY was elected.

TUESDAY, January 31.

THOMAS DOUGHERTY, who was, on yesterday, elected Clerk of this House, gave his attendance, and took the oath of office prescribed by the act, entitled "An act to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths."

Mr. EASTON presented a memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Missouri, setting forth the defenceless situation of that Territory, and praying that such number of troops may be stationed in said Territory as will be sufficient, not only to repel aggression, but to carry on active warfare in the heart of the enemy's country. Laid on the table.

The Committee of Ways and Means were discharged from a further consideration of a resolution of the 12th of November last, relative to the importation of certain goods free of duty, and it was referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

On motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, the Committee on the Judiciary were discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, presented on the 9th instant; and from the further consideration of the petition of the Legislature of the Territory of Illinois, presented on the 18th instant; as also, from the further consideration of the resolution of the 4th instant, relative to fugitives from justice, and to persons escaping from the service of their masters; and the said memorials and resolutions were referred to Messrs. SHARP, TAYLOR, LAW, SHERWOOD, KING, of North Carolina, WOOD, and JENNINGS.

The bill from the Senate, "in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EPES, of Virginia, reported a bill to fix the compensation and increase the accountability of collectors of the direct tax; which was twice read, and committed.

The bill sent from the House to prohibit intercourse with the enemy, was returned to the House with sundry amendments; which occasioned considerable discussion, but were all concurred in eventually.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Government for 1815.—[The civil list bill.]

Bills of this description are generally considered as little more than mere matter of form, as designating moneys to be applied to purposes already authorized by law; and, therefore, seldom give rise to discussion. One clause of this bill, however, gave rise to a wide and rather animated debate of a desultory character.

Mr. McKEE, of Kentucky, moved to strike out the clause which appropriates, for the salary of the Superintendent General of Military Supplies, and clerks and messenger employed in his office, ten thousand dollars. This motion he predicated on the idea that this office was in itself unimportant, and its utility by no means commensurate with its cost to the Government.

This motion was supported, in debate, by the mover and Messrs. PITKIN, SHEFFEY, GASTON, FARROW, HANSON, and GROSVENOR; and opposed by Messrs. EPPES, HAWKINS, WRIGHT, and FISK, of New York.

On the one hand, it was alleged that no man could assign the uses of this office to the Government, or at least any adequate to its cost, which could not as well be performed by a single clerk in the office of the Accountant of the War Department, &c.; and, if useless, that it would be a proper course to strike out that item of this bill, and postpone it till the bill making appropriations for the Military department should come under consideration, in which it might be conveniently inserted, if then deemed expedient to be continued.

On the other hand it was argued, that this office was one of great importance to the proper distribution and accountability for military supplies, of which a proper account and checks thereon could in no way, probably, be so well supplied. If, however, the continuance of this office were not indispensable, of which most of the gentlemen on either side professed themselves unqualified to judge, this was not the proper way to get at the office for the purpose of abolishing it. The office now existed by law, and it was as proper and necessary to appropriate money for its support as for that of any office under the Government.

When the question was taken, there appeared to be, for striking out the clause 59, against it, 54.

The bill as amended was reported to the House, but the House adjourned before deciding on the amendments made in Committee.

WEDNESDAY, February 1.

Mr. MOORE presented a petition of the Committee of Vigilance and Safety of the city and precincts of Baltimore, representing the defenceless situation of that city, and praying that a force may be provided adequate to their defence, during the next campaign.—Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JENNINGS presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the Indiana Territory, praying that the said Territory may be erected into a separate and independent State.—Laid on the table.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas and John Clifford, of Philadelphia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KERSHAW, from the Committee of Accounts, reported a bill to compel the Clerk of the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, to give security for the faithful application and disbursement of the contingent fund of the said House; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Uriah Coolidge and James Burnham; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of George S. Wise; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. YANCEY, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate "for the relief of William Gamble," made a report thereon; which was read, and, together with the bill, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a duty on gold, silver, and plated ware, and jewelry, and paste work, manufactured within the United States; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill laying a direct tax upon the District of Columbia.

SURETIES OF A COLLECTOR.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report on the petition of Solomon Frazer and Mary Eccleston; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the whole House on Saturday next. The report is as follows:

That the following is the statement of facts which must govern the opinion of the House in this case:

James Frazer was appointed collector of the port of Vienna, in Maryland, about the 1st day of April, 1795; and Solomon Frazer and Charles Eccleston (the latter now deceased, of whom the petitioner, Mary Eccleston, is the personal representative,) became his sureties in a bond to the United States in the penal sum of two thousand dollars. At the end of the year 1795, James Frazer was in arrear, on rendering his accounts to the Government, in the sum of $350 82; which balance against him continued to increase from year to year, until the month of June, 1805, about which time James Frazer went out of office, when the sum due from him to the United States was $3,924 86. No measures were taken by the United States to enforce the payment of the arrears due from James Frazer until June, 1785, (after he was out of office,) when a suit was commenced against him and his sureties. The writ against James Frazer was returned, served at September term, 1807, and judgment was obtained against him at September term, 1808, for the balance of his account. Execution was taken out on this judgment, on the 29th day of June, 1810, by virtue of which James Frazer was imprisoned; and on the 3d day of July thereafter was discharged from his imprisonment, by an order of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the ground of his insolvency. This order of the Secretary was irregular, being granted by him under a mistaken supposition that James Frazer was imprisoned on a judgment obtained on a revenue bond; the law empowering the Secretary to discharge from imprisonment in certain cases not extending to the case of collectors.

It does not appear when the insolvency of James Frazer took place; but it appears that, in February, 1804, he sustained a considerable loss by fire; and that he had property to the amount of two or three thousand dollars about the end of the year 1808.

It also appears that a judgment was obtained against Solomon Frazer for the sum of $2,000, (the penalty of the bond,) before the year 1808, which is still in force. It does not appear that any judgment has been obtained against Charles Eccleston or his personal representative.

On this statement of facts the committee are of opinion that the petitioners are entitled to the relief they ask for; and, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitions of Solomon Frazer and Mary Eccleston is reasonable, and ought to be granted.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole to the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1815; and the said amendments being again read, were concurred in by the House, except the following, to wit:

“Strike out the following items:

“For compensation to the Superintendent General of Military Supplies, clerks, and persons employed in his office, —;”

“For contingent expenses in the office of the Superintendent General of Military Supplies, —.”

After much debate, the question was taken to concur with the Committee of the House in striking out the said items, and was determined in the negative—yeas 61, nays 86, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Virginia Military Land Claims.

H. OF R.

VIRGINIA MILITARY LAND CLAIMS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Sarah Easton and Dorothy Storer, representatives of Colonel Robert H. Harrison, of Virginia, deceased, who pray for permission to locate a land warrant granted to them by the State of Virginia in consideration of the revolutionary services of the deceased, on the public lands, a portion of which rightfully belongs, as it is contended, to Virginia for the satisfaction of claims of this character.

[The circumstances of this case are nearly these: Colonel Harrison was one of the best and most approved officers of the Continental army, until after the siege of Yorktown, in the Revolutionary war, in the capacity of aid and secretary to General Washington, whose representatives did not, until 1813, obtain from the State of Virginia a grant of land in consideration of his services; which grant, however, owing to the cession of her land by Virginia to the United States, without sufficient reservation for the satisfaction of military claims, (though such reservation was intended,) is of no present use to them; and they therefore pray permission to locate this warrant on any unappropriated lands of the United States, and also pray compensation from the United States for the services of their deceased father. The committee to whom the petition was referred report, that this case cannot be distinguished from a mass of other claims, barred by the statute of limitations, and therefore ought not to be granted.]

This report was warmly and eloquently opposed by Mr. SMITH, of New York, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. SHEFFEY, and Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, and Mr. MCKEE, of Kentucky, and advocated by Mr. BOWEN, of Tennessee, Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, and Mr. CHAPPELL, of South Carolina.

The debate on the report spread over the whole field of the equitable right of the State of Virginia to claim of the United States the location of her military land warrants on the lands of the United States, seeing that she only of all the States had accepted the invitation of the General Government to cede to them all her public land, reserving only a portion thereof for the satisfaction of claims and donations for military services, which portion had been too small for that object. Those who opposed the report advocated this right; those who supported the report denied the legal or equitable claim of Virginia. Other topics intermingled in the debate, arising in a degree from State feelings, but not from any denial of the merits of Colonel Harrison, except by the assertion that there were persons in other States, of equal merit, to whom, or to whose representatives, no compensation had been granted for their military services, comparable to that now proposed to be too generously bestowed on the representatives of Colonel Harrison, in preference to the satisfaction of other claimants for Revolutionary services, whose claims were rigorously barred by the statute of limitations. On the other hand, the location of the land warrant granted by Virginia, was claimed as a right growing out of the cession by Virginia to the General Government, with a reservation of a certain tract of land (which had proved insufficient) for the satisfaction of her military land warrants.

The debate resulted in a disagreement to the resolution reported by the Committee of Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, and the adoption of the following in lieu of it:

Resolved, That so much of the said petition as prays compensation for the extraordinary and valuable revolutionary services of the ancestors of the petitioners, be rejected; and, that so much thereof as prays that a law may pass authorizing them to locate, on the lands of the United States, a warrant lately issued to them by the State of Virginia, for the services aforesaid, is reasonable and ought to be granted."

This resolve having been reported to the House, they adjourned without coming to a decision thereon.

The Senate have passed a bill "making appropriations for repairing or rebuilding the public buildings in the City of Washington;" in which bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

AMY DARDIN.

The bill for the relief of Amy Dardin, the representative of David Dardin, deceased, passed through a Committee of the Whole, was widely debated, and at last (for perhaps the twentieth time in one or other branch of the Legislature) ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.—For the bill 69, against it 59, as follows :

MONDAY, February 6.

An engrossed bill for the relief of the Anacostia Bridge Company was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of the legal representatives of David Dardin was read the third time ; and a motion was made, by Mr. TAYLOR, that the said bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of admitting to payment at the Treasury, all just claims against the United States, which have been liquidated and barred by any resolve or statute of limitations.

And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

The question was then taken, Shall the bill pass ? and passed in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, a memorial from Thomas Ewell, of this District ; in which, after describing the advantages of such institutions, he prays a law may be passed, authorizing landed proprietors of the United States, to issue notes payable six months after date, &c., (in the manner of the notes Mr. E. himself had issued,) which was read by the Clerk, and laid on the table.

BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made a report recommending the adoption of the following resolve :

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress be and they are hereby presented to Major General Jackson, and through him to the officers and men under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct, in defeating the enemy before the city of New Orleans, in successive battles fought on the 23d of December, 1814, and 1st and 8th of January, 1815 ; in which a British veteran army, formidable in number as in discipline, commanded by renowned Generals, was thrice beaten and driven back with great loss, and in the battle of the 8th of January, with immense slaughter, by a militia force hastily collected to the defence of that city, aided by a small body of regular troops ; thus illustrating the patriotic defence of the country with brilliant achievement, and signaling the Americans by steady perseverance, incessant vigilance, patient suffering, undaunted firmness, and in victory moderation and clemency : And that the President of the United States be requested to cause a gold medal to be struck, with suitable emblems and devices, and presented to Major General Jackson, in testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of events so memorable, and of services so eminent.

The resolution was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

CLASSIFICATION OF MILITIA.

Mr. RICH, of Vermont, having caught the SPEAKER's eye, spoke nearly as follows :

Sir: Impressed as I am with the importance of the crisis to which our country is approaching, and anxious as I feel to contribute the utmost of my feeble efforts to insure success to the contest in which it is engaged, I deem it unnecessary that I should offer an apology for troubling the House with the propositions I am about to submit. Surely, sir, if the present contest shall terminate ingloriously, the cause of it must and will be charged upon this Congress; and, I may be permitted to add, that nothing can ever be urged as an apology for us. For it can never be said, that the country which has produced a Brown, a Scott, and a Jackson, with the Spartan bands which have fought by their sides, and which contains near two millions of men equally capable of bearing arms, together with all the means of supplying armies and subsisting its inhabitants, can be unsuccessful in a contest with any nation whatever, except for want of a proper application of the means within the power of the Government. With a knowledge, however, of the difficulty we have experienced in uniting the House in any important measures, I ought, perhaps, to forbear making an attempt at a new project at this late period of the session, and content myself with trusting the defence of our country to what regular forces may be obtained by the ordinary mode of enlistment, relying on volunteers and militia for the balance. But, sir, when I consider the dangers with which our country is threatened, and the unequal burdens which are imposed upon the people by draughts from the militia, as well as the enormous expense attending them, I feel it my duty, late as it is, to make one effort to accomplish that which shall better comport with what I believe to be a duty we owe to the community.

Mr. R. then submitted the following resolutions :

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for arranging the citizens subject to the direct tax, into classes, in such manner that each shall, as far as may be practicable, consist of persons residing contiguous to each other, and from which together — hundred dollars shall be due; and of permitting each class to furnish one man for the regular Army, within a given number of days, in lieu of said tax.

Resolved, That the said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of augmenting the direct tax for the present year, so as that it may be sufficient to procure — thousand men at — hundred dollars each.

The House having agreed to consider these resolutions, Mr. R. again rose and addressed the House as follows :

Having submitted the propositions before you, it is due to myself and to the House, that I should give a brief explanation of my views as to the details of the proposed measure. I propose, sir, that it shall be made the duty of the principal assessors in the several States, as soon as the tax lists shall be made out, to furnish each assistant assessor with a list comprehending the taxable persons in the assessment districts respectively, and that the assistant assessors shall be required to arrange them into classes in such manner that each class shall, as far as may be practicable, consist of persons residing contiguous to each other, and from whom, in the whole, two hundred dollars of the tax shall be due; requiring of the said assessors that they should make a return of the classification to the collector, designing the classes by numbers, or in some other manner which shall be sufficiently descriptive, and that the citizens of each assessment district should be notified of the class to which they may severally belong, and of the tax due from each, by the posting up of class lists, at a suitable number of the most public places in each district. I propose that each class should be allowed to exonerate itself from the tax by furnishing a man (within a given number of days) to engage for the war, without the bounty in money from the Government; but to be entitled to the land bounty, and that a class on furnishing a recruit should be entitled to a certificate from the officer authorized to receive the recruits, which being presented to the collector should be good payment for the tax of the class. And in the absence of such certificate, for a given number of days, the collector should proceed in the collection. It is not improbable that in arranging the classes it might be expedient in some cases, and perhaps in all, to include in a class those whose tax together should amount to four, or six, or perhaps eight hundred dollars, and provide that it should exonerate itself from the tax by furnishing a corresponding number of men. I feel no difficulty, sir, in hazarding an opinion, that most of the classes would furnish the men, and I believe they would do so, because thereby they would make a saving to themselves in money, and not only would they make a saving in amount, but in most cases they would pay a recruit in the necessary supplies for a family, and in various other ways, in which they would compensate him, with more convenience than to raise the same amount in money at a given period. And in aid of this plan, we should enlist, not only all the feelings which result from a wish to see the country properly defended, but those of pecuniary interest. Every taxable citizen would in a degree voluntarily become a recruiting officer, and, among the whole, there can be little doubt but a sufficient number of recruits would be found. If, however, it should be believed, that to allow two hundred dollars of the tax for a recruit would be a sum insufficient to insure the obtaining of them, let the sum be augmented, and, if necessary, increase the tax accordingly; to which I can see no objection, as, whatever the nominal amount of the tax may be, no other burden would be imposed on the people, than the smallest sum necessary to procure the men; and sure I am, that at a time when the people in every direction are crying aloud to the Government to provide an army for the defence of everything dear to them, they will not complain of the imposition of the burdens necessary to that object, particularly if no more money is required of them, than what they shall find necessary, they having the sole direction of the application of it. I am not insensible, that to raise any given number of men in the manner I propose, may nominally cost the Government something more than to raise them in the ordinary mode; but I believe it would cost the people much less. Indeed, I very much doubt whether our soldiers do not now cost two hundred dollars each, taking into consideration the bounty, premiums, pay, and rations, to recruiting officers, loss of money in the hands of some of them, and other incidental expenses. I am not able to anticipate any Constitutional objections which can be urged against the plan I have proposed, even by the most scrupulous. Nor can I presume that it will be subject to the term of "conscription," a word which to some is so alarming. The present direct tax of six millions of dollars, if applied in the manner proposed, allowing two hundred dollars for each recruit, would raise thirty thousand men; but it cannot be calculated that the whole tax will be thus applied, even if the citizens should in no part of the country find any difficulty in procuring a sufficient number of men, because there will in all of the States be more or less property owned by non-residents, to which the classification would not be applicable. It might therefore be fair to calculate that, from the cause I have just mentioned, and other incidental causes, not more than twenty or twenty-five thousand would be obtained, while the balance of the tax would be paid in money.

I will not at present hazard an opinion as to the number which we ought to calculate on raising, provided the plan is adopted—that being a subject which more properly belongs to others. But, presuming that it might be expedient to increase the tax for the present year, with a view of enlarging the number of men beyond what the six millions would raise, I have proposed by the second resolution an inquiry on that subject.

I may perhaps be told, that, in consequence of the pledges contained in the direct tax bill, and the engagements of the Government founded on them, there is an insurmountable difficulty in the way of adopting the plan I have suggested, and such may be the fact, though I am myself inclined to a different opinion.

If, however, there be no other way of getting over the supposed difficulties, I should be in favor of substituting other new taxes, or of so increasing the present direct tax, as to make it sufficient to procure a proper number of men, leaving the present six millions to find their way into the Treasury. Gentlemen perhaps will say, that, to substitute other indirect taxes for the present direct tax, or to increase the direct tax in the manner I have proposed, will be to impose burdens upon the people heavier than can be borne. I admit they will be heavy; but, sir, the people of this country had rather support their rights at any expense than surrender them, and I am altogether mistaken as to public opinion, or it is clamorous from every quarter, for the Government to adopt strong, energetic measures, such as, with common prudence and exertion, will insure success. I have not the vanity to suppose that the propositions I have submitted, are free from objections. But, unless something can be offered less liable to them, I hope they may be adopted, for sure I am that we ought to do something, and that without delay. Should it be objected that too great delay will attend the plan I have submitted, I ask of gentlemen to present one which shall be practicable, and which will be attended with less, and assure them that I will give my aid in adopting it. But I beg of gentlemen that we may not let this session pass by without doing something which will have a tendency to relieve our citizens from their fearful apprehension.

Mr. WEBSTER opposed these resolves, and demanded the yeas and nays on their adoption. He objected to the consideration, at this late hour, of new projects, which, though they would seriously obstruct the recruiting service, could produce no good. The present direct tax, he observed, was pledged to specific purposes; and an addition to the direct tax was not practicable, that tax being already as heavy as could be borne. The true interest of the country, he believed, indicated a reliance on voluntary enlistments for filling the ranks of the Army, &c.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH appeared to be inclined to see this subject referred to a Committee of the Whole, for a full and mature consideration.

Mr. WRIGHT expressed his regret at seeing such a proposition introduced at this time, for, sure he was, it would produce no good; but, besides consuming public time, the very publication of the motion would have a tendency to check the recruiting service. He had information which authorized him to say that there was a perfect confidence the Army would be filled in good time by the ordinary process of recruiting; and, if we had been able to obtain money at the commencement of the session, he had no doubt but the Army would now have presented a very numerical front, indeed. He adverted to the high bounties now paid, compared to those paid during the Revolution, which would soon produce a good army, and an army of wealthy men, too, each entitled, by virtue of his enlistment, to three hundred and twenty acres of land. The States, too, were raising troops, of which the State of Maryland had magnanimously voted to raise five thousand. These new projects, Mr. W. feared, would defeat the only one on which reliance could be placed, viz: the recruiting service.

Mr. GROSVENOR said, he was totally opposed to this motion in principle, which was, besides, impracticable. The assumption of the direct tax, by some of the States, interposed, of itself, an insuperable difficulty in the way of this wild project.

Mr. GUOLSON said, he did believe that the subject of providing for filling the ranks of the regular army and of providing the ways and means, ought, until they were entirely arranged, to occupy the attention of Congress, to the exclusion of all other business. That the mode now proposed was the proper one for filling the ranks, he did not say; but, as it introduced this subject of inquiry, he hoped the resolution would be adopted. That the country was capable of bringing at once a regular army into the field, no man acquainted with its resources could deny, if they were properly applied. The only question, then, was whether such an army was wanting? Of that, he thought there could be no doubt; and he therefore hoped the House would seriously enter on this subject.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, opposed a proposed postponement of this motion, not that he approved it entirely, but because it was susceptible of modification, and that, in his opinion, it would become Congress, before they parted, to take some efficient and certain measures to fill the ranks of the regular army. A combination of this proposition with that made with the War Department, at the commencement of the session, would produce such a system as he should approve; and such, as he believed, from the want of money, the Government would at last be compelled to resort to. What answer, he asked, could they give to their constituents, if they returned home and left the country comparatively defenceless? It was time, he said, that they should act, and act efficiently.

Mr. STANFORD made a motion to lay the resolves on the table; which was negatived.

Mr. LOWNDES objected to the inquiry into the propriety of diverting the direct tax already laid, or a part of it, to the purposes of raising men. After that tax had been solemnly pledged by law to a specific purpose, to enter into a discussion of the propriety of diverting it to any other purpose, while it would be impracticable for any useful end, might be seriously injurious to the finances and credit of the country. He had no objections, however, to inquire into the propriety of increasing the direct tax to this end.

Mr. TROUP (the chairman of the Military Committee) said that, being a member of the committee to whom it was proposed to refer this subject, it did not become him to express any decided opinion on it. All he hoped was, that the House would not instruct the committee on this head, unless determined to perfect the proposition into the shape of a law; inasmuch as the committee, in its ministerial capacity, had already cognizance over this subject, and could report on it without instruction, if deemed by them expedient. With respect to the military subjects of the present session, the House could not fail to recollect that the report of the Secretary of War had stated what force we had, and what addition to it was desirable for the further defence of the country. It had been proposed to Congress to augment the regular force to one hundred thousand men, for which purpose it was proposed to resort to the most energetic means. It was necessary for the committee of this House, said Mr. T., to endeavor to ascertain the opinion of both branches of the Legislature, as to the different modes of raising men. We did so; and found that no efficacious measure, calculated certainly and promptly to fill the regular army, could be effectually resorted to. Measures were matured and proposed by the committee, but were not pressed on the House from the solemn conviction that there was no disposition in the Legislature to act finally on the subject. This being ascertained, other measures were adopted, to improve the recruiting service, to authorize the acceptance into the service of volunteers and State troops in the nature of regulars. If the whole number authorized of the two latter could be commanded, together with the sixty thousand regulars, (supposing the ranks to be filled,) it would give an effective force of one hundred and forty thousand men, and might be reasonably expected to produce one hundred thousand; as great a number, perhaps, as, under present circumstances, the finances of the country would bear. Even at this late day of the session; however, Mr. T. said, he was willing to resort to the only certain and effectual mode of augmenting the regular army to a hundred thousand men, to the support of which the finances of the country might, before the adjournment, be made adequate. He hoped, at least, the House would so decide on this question, as to make the vote on it decisive of their real views in regard to it.

Mr. ALSTON remarked, in reply to the objection derived from the existing pledge of the direct tax, that that pledge applied only to the continuance of that tax until a certain part of the principal and interest of the debt should be redeemed; but the proceeds of the tax might be applied to this or any other purpose the Government should see fit.

Mr. MACON was of opinion that the motion proposed no violation of the public faith. If the army could be filled by the regular mode of enlistment, as was now said, how happened it that so many projects of this nature were offered? The reliance on volunteers and State troops was uncertain; and Congress ought to devise some mode by which the ranks of the army could be positively filled. If it could be done without violating the public faith, Mr. M. said it was his opinion, that the direct tax could be more easily paid in this way than in money, and he should therefore favor the plan.

At length, after some other desultory debate, the resolves were, on motion of Mr. FISK, of Vermont, believing, he said, they would not pass in their present shape, referred to a Committee of the whole House—63 to 57—and ordered to be printed, 58 to 39.

TUESDAY, February 7.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the annual report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, detailing their proceedings since their last report, made on the 5th of February, 1814; which was read.

On motion of Mr. EASTON, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of better regulating, by law, the working and leasing the public lead mines in the Territory of Missouri, in such manner as to secure the lessees in the quiet enjoyment of their leases, and to enable the Government to collect its rents; and that the committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

MESSRS. EASTON, SHEFFEY, and MONTGOMERY, were appointed the committee.

The engrossed bill making provision for subsisting the armies of the United States, by authorizing the appointment of Commissioners of Subsistence, was read a third time, and passed.

PAY OF THE MEMBERS.

Mr. SHIPHERD, of New York, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the making a reasonable compensation to the members of both Houses of Congress for travelling to and from Congress, and attendance thereon, respectively; and that they report thereon by bill or otherwise; and that the committee embrace in such inquiry the present session.

Mr. PEARSON inquired the object of this motion, and the grounds for it.

Mr. SHIPHERD said he should have supposed his honorable friend understood his own interest sufficiently not to have required any explanation on this head. Congress having the right to regulate their own pay, in the same manner as the compensation of other officers of the Government, they ought to render to themselves that justice which they feel bound to do other officers of the Government. He need not, he said, tell the House that the pay now received by the members was not half what its value was when that pay was fixed; more particularly when it was considered that the paper with which the members were paid, was full twenty-five per cent. below par or the value of specie. His object was so to augment the pay of the members as to make it equal to six dollars of that medium in which members formerly received their pay.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, said he did not conceive this the proper time to enter into the consideration of this subject. He thought gentlemen should let the nation get through the war before they increased their pay.

Mr. FARROW was opposed to the motion throughout, on principle, and denied the alleged depreciation of money, which he said was very gladly received in payment, in dealings of any sort, in the District.

Mr. SHIPHERD, in support of his first observation, said, that it was as obvious that all our paper was depreciated, as that the Continental money was depreciated. He had no fastidious delicacy about him, which would prevent him from doing justice to himself. If payment could be obtained in specie, it would be a good argument against the proposed motion; but it was notorious that for specie they must pay a discount of twenty-five per cent. on the paper which they received for their pay.

Mr. RHEA said that every member knew, when he was chosen, what compensation he was to expect, and had no right to complain of it. He required the yeas and nays, that he might at least record his vote against the motion.

Mr. HALL, of Georgia, observed, if the object of the gentleman was, as he had avowed, to give to the members a compensation adequate to their services, he would recommend to him to depreciate their pay instead of increasing it, for he was confident the acts of Congress had depreciated as much as the paper of which the gentleman had spoken.

The question on the adoption of the motion was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows: For the motion 8, against it 99.

[Those who voted in the affirmative were Messrs. BOYD, DAVIS of Massachusetts, FISK of Vermont, GROSVENOR, HOPKINS of Kentucky, SHIPHERD, STURGES, and THOMPSON.]

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The House then, on motion of Mr. LEWIS, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate making an appropriation of five hundred thousand dollars, for repairing or rebuilding the public buildings in the City of Washington. [The money is to be borrowed of banks or individuals within the District, at six per cent. interest, for rebuilding or repairing the Capitol, President's House, and public offices, on their present sites.]

A debate arose on this bill which occupied the remainder of the day's sitting.

The advocates of the main object of the bill were, MESSRS. LEWIS, FISK of Vermont, RHEA of Tennessee, INGERSOLL, WRIGHT, GROSVENOR, DUVALL, BOWEN, MCKIM, SHIPHERD, HAWKINS, and PEARSON; its opponents, MESSRS. ALSTON, FARROW, and WEBSTER. Of those who advocated the bill, there were several (MESSRS. INGERSOLL, GROSVENOR, DUVALL, and SHIPHERD) who have been in favor of a removal of the Seat of Government; but, considering the question as settled by the votes in both Houses, desired now to see the city rebuilt and beautified.

The debate was not so much on the expediency of rebuilding or repairing the public buildings, as on the mode of doing it.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH moved to strike out from the bill the "President's House," so as to confine the repairs to the Capitol and public offices, with a view to leave the repair of the President's House to times of more leisure and tranquillity than the present, and also with a view to a future concentration of the public buildings.

This motion, after debate, was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. GROSVENOR then moved an amendment, the object of which was, to cause the public offices to be removed to the public grounds on Capitol Hill, near the Capitol. This motion, after debate, was agreed to, 66 to 56.

The Committee then rose and reported the amendments to the House; and the House forthwith adjourned.

The Reward of Valor—Public Buildings.

H. OF R.

WEDNESDAY, February 8.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported sundry amendments to the bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes for 1815; which were referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, from the Military Committee, reported without amendment a bill from the Senate concerning field officers in the militia.

[This bill provides that, after the first day of March next, there shall be to each regiment, instead of the present field officers, one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, and two majors.]

The question being stated, "Shall the bill be read a third time?"

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, moved to refer it to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH, of New York, supported the motion for reference or postponement, with a view to proposing amendments for the better organization of the militia in other respects, and for providing the manner in which future detachments of the militia shall be regulated.

The motion was opposed by Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, but was decided in the affirmative—54 to 41.

Mr. JACKSON, from the same committee, reported a bill making provision for clothing the militia called into the service of the United States.

[The bill proposes to provide that, in addition to the pay and emoluments now provided by law, the non-commissioned officers and privates in the militia, when called into service for a tour of six months, shall be entitled to one suit of clothes.]

The bill was twice read, and committed.

THE REWARD OF VALOR.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the following resolutions, the adoption of which is recommended by the said committee, viz:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to cause a monument to be erected at a suitable place, and with a suitable inscription, in testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of the military virtues of the late Brigadier General Pike, who, gallantly leading a column to the attack of York, in Upper Canada, fell, in the arms of victory, on the 27th April, 1812, terminating gloriously a life devoted to his country, and leaving behind him an honorable example of enterprise, perseverance, and contempt of death, for the imitation of the American soldier.

2. Resolved, That the thanks of Congress be, and they are hereby, presented to Major General Harrison and to Governor Shelby, and through them to the officers and men under their command, for their gallantry and good conduct in defeating the combined British and Indian forces under Major General Proctor, on the Thames, in Upper Canada, the 5th of October, 1813, capturing the entire British army, with their baggage, camp equipage, and artillery; and that the President of the United States be requested to cause gold medals to be struck, emblematical of this triumph, and presented to General Harrison and Governor Shelby.

3. Resolved, That Congress entertain a high sense of the gallantry and good conduct of Lieutenant Colonel Beatty, and the officers and men under his command, in repulsing, with inferior numbers, the combined attack of a British land and naval force on Craney Island, on the 22d of June, 1813; and that the President of the United States be requested to present an elegant sword to Lieutenant Colonel Beatty.

4. Resolved, That Congress entertain a high sense of the merit of Colonel Croghan, and the officers and men under his command, for the gallant defence of Fort Stephenson, on the Lower Sandusky, on the 1st and 2d of August, 1813, repelling with great slaughter the assault of a British and Indian army much superior in number; and that the President be requested to present an elegant sword to Colonel Croghan.

5. Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause a monument to be erected, at a suitable place and with a suitable inscription, to the memory of Brigadier General Covington, who, gallantly leading up his troops to a successful charge, fell in the battle of Williamsburg, in Upper Canada, on the 11th November, 1813.

6. Resolved, That the thanks of Congress be, and they are hereby, presented to Major General Jackson, and to Brigadier Generals Floyd and Coffee, and through them to the officers and men under their command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the campaign against the Creek Nation of Indians in the Winter of 1813-'14, defeating formidable tribes of savages in successive battles, fought with great obstinacy, and finally subduing them to terms of peace; and that the President of the United States be requested to cause gold medals to be struck, with suitable emblems and devices, and presented to Major General Jackson, and Brigadiers Floyd and Coffee.

7. Resolved, That Congress entertain a high sense of the merit of Lieutenant Colonel Armistead, and the officers and men under his command, in their late gallant and successful defence of Fort McHenry against the attack of a formidable British squadron; and that the President of the United States be requested to present an elegant sword to Lieutenant Colonel Armistead.

8. Resolved, That Congress entertain a high sense of the merit of Major Lawrence, and the officers and men under his command, in their late gallant defence of Fort Bowyer, repelling with inferior numbers, and with great slaughter, the combined attack of a British land and naval force, aided by a body of savages; and that the President of the United States be requested to present an elegant sword to Major Lawrence.

The resolutions were twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill for making appropriations for repairing or rebuilding the public buildings in the city of Washington.

That amendment being under consideration which requires the public offices to be built on Capitol Hill—

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, rose and said, that he hoped the House would not concur in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole. After the lengthy discussion of this subject yesterday, it was with extreme reluctance that he again obtruded himself upon the patience of the House; but the deep stake which the State he had the honor to represent, in part, had in its decision, he trusted would be a sufficient apology.

Mr. L. said, that since yesterday, he had been enabled to fortify the opinions he had advanced in opposition to the amendment, by an authority which ought to be revered by all. He had obtained the correspondence between General Washington, then President of the United States, and Mr. Adams his successor, and the commissioners for the city, upon the subject of the location of the public offices, which he would take the liberty of reading. He then read a letter from Mr. White, one of the commissioners, who stated "that in a conversation with General Washington, upon the subject of the location of the public buildings, the General was decidedly of opinion, that the offices of the different departments should be as convenient to the President as possible, and that it was unnecessary, for any public convenience, that they should be contiguous to the Legislative Hall; indeed, that the officers had complained to him, when in Philadelphia, that it was impossible to attend to their public duties from the constant calls of the members, and that they were obliged to deny themselves." He also read a letter from the commissioners of the city, to General Washington, at Mount Vernon, requesting him to fix on the sites for the public offices, and his answer, fixing a day for that purpose—and a letter from Mr. Adams, ratifying and confirming the acts of the commissioners in fixing the sites of the public offices under the direction of General Washington.

Thus then, said Mr. L., we have not only the opinion of that illustrious man, as to the most proper sites for the public offices, but we have evidence that ought to satisfy the most incredulous, that he actually came upon the ground, and marked the very spots upon which the buildings were to be placed, and these acts were officially confirmed by his successor, Mr. Adams. But my honorable friend from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) has said, that General Washington had been teased and importuned by those interested, into the location he had made. Sir, said Mr. L., my honorable friend can know little of the character of that great man, if he believes there existed a being who dared approach him in that way. No, sir, as soon would he attempt to grasp the forked lightning, as to intimate a wish that he would swerve from his public duty.

There were many considerations, said Mr. L., why no changes ought to be made in the present plan of the city, or of the sites for the public buildings; and that which operated most irresistibly with him was, that it was a plan sanctioned by that great and good man, whose name it bears. Sir, said Mr. L., what that man has done, let no mortal attempt to undo. His ways are not to be mended by man. This House is not competent to do it. He considered the two public edifices, the foundation stones of which our ever to be revered hero, statesman, and patriot, laid, as permanently fixed, by public faith; particularly as maps were distributed throughout Europe, with the sanction of President Washington, designating the sites of the Capitol, President's House, and other public buildings, and that foreigners had been induced to purchase property, judging of its value from its contiguity to some one of the public edifices as marked upon the map. Change the situation of your city, and they are deceived and injured; hereafter they will have no confidence in your acts. We have been told, that large quantities of our public stock have been lately sent to Holland for sale. Is it to be believed, sir, with a knowledge of what we are about to do, (for it is in that country that our city lots have been sold, and held as security for money borrowed,) that they will trust us for a cent, when everything which they deemed sacred is thus violated? No, sir, they will not, and I will say, they ought not to trust us. But, sir, if we have no regard to our plighted faith to foreigners, let us at least save our own people. Do not, by this act, ruin thousands of honest, industrious mechanics, who have at very advanced prices purchased and improved lots near the present sites, under an assurance and firm belief in their permanency. Let us not do an act which will excite distrust abroad and contempt at home.

But, why are gentlemen desirous of removing the offices from their present sites near the President's House, to the Capitol square? It had been shown, he hoped satisfactorily, that their appropriate place was near the President's House, and not the Capitol. The President must necessarily have considerable intercourse with the offices; but he was unable to see the necessity of any personal intercourse between the members of the Legislature and the offices. It is known that all public business between Congress or its members, and the public offices, is done by a resolution of the House, or by letter from any individual member, which is conveyed by a messenger of Congress paid for that purpose.

In addition to the reasons given for a preference of the old sites, there would be a saving of more than one half of the expense. The committee, to whom this subject was confided, attended personally at the Capitol, and examined the state of that building, when, after a conference, and making such inquiries of an architect on the spot, as was considered proper, they were induced to believe that the walls of both wings of the Capitol might be safely built on, and that the estimated expense of about $250,000 for repairing the same, was as nearly accurate, as could be reasonably expected. The President's House and the offices were not so particularly examined, but it was the opinion of the committee, that the whole might be repaired for about $500,000, which would be $715,110 less than the first cost of those buildings. But, Mr. L. said there was another objection which would be, with him, an insuperable one; and that was, that he would not be compelled by an act of the enemy to abandon, or change in the smallest degree, any of the plans of the public edifices they had destroyed.

FEBRUARY, 1815.

Public Buildings.

H. OF R.

He would rebuild them precisely on the same ground; not a stone or brick should be changed, but they should be finished in a style of increased magnificence and grandeur. It never should be said, because the enemy had destroyed our Capitol, that Congress were afraid to rebuild it, lest it might again be destroyed. No, let us have another trial, and if we cannot then defend our Capitol, it will be time to put an end to the war in the best way we can. My friend from North Carolina (Mr. GASTON) objects to an appropriation of so much money at a time like this, when the Treasury is bankrupt, our soldiers unpaid, &c., for repairing the public buildings; but he has no objection to double the sum for the purpose of rebuilding on new sites. How inconsistent! The gentleman from North Carolina ought to recollect, that not a cent of this appropriation would come out of the Treasury. The banks of the District had generously and magnanimously come forward and offered to loan the amount wanted upon reasonable terms, for the accomplishment of an object so interesting to the District; and it was probable that the sales of lots belonging to the public in the city, would furnish money enough to reimburse the loan before it became due. Reject this amendment—pass this bill, which will restore public confidence, and there will be no difficulty in selling, at good prices, the property of the public, which is now worthless. My friend from New Hampshire (Mr. WEBSTER) says, he does not think this a proper time to make an appropriation for building up the Capitol, and recommends that some trifling alterations be made in the present room, which will then answer very well until we have peace. Mr. L. said, he congratulated his friend upon the sudden change of his feelings. It was but a few days since, the gentleman could not exist in this confined, inconvenient, and unwholesome room, and nothing but the pure atmosphere of Philadelphia would satisfy him; but now it seems, when it is ascertained he cannot get to Philadelphia, that he is perfectly reconciled with the present room, and thinks it good enough for war times. The gentleman from New Hampshire also complains, that this city is deficient in population, in wealth and commerce, and therefore an improper place for the seat of Government. If it be true that it is thus deficient, to what, I ask, is it to be ascribed? Let those who, like the gentleman from New Hampshire, are desirous of removing the seat of Government, answer. It is to the repeated efforts to remove, to retrocede, and to concentrate, which have been alternately made for the last twelve years in Congress, that the population and wealth of Washington have not equalled any other town on the continent of its age. What prudent man, I ask, would risk his fortune in making improvements in a place, that was every year threatened with destruction, by the very power who ought to foster and protect it? If inconveniences have been felt from the dispersed population of the city and the want of accommodations, those alone are accountable who by their own acts have produced both. The people of this District are political orphans. They have been abandoned by their legitimate parents, and claim protection of us, who are constitutionally bound to protect them; but, instead of extending to them the parental hand of affection and assistance, we cruelly abandon them to their fate. If they ask us for bread, we give them a stone. If they even ask us for justice, we tell them they are rudely importunate. Instead of extending to them the parental hand of affection, we do all in our power to blight and destroy their fair prospects. If we are not disposed to be their guardians and friends, let us at least do nothing to injure them; let them pursue undisturbed their own way, and you will not have to complain of the want of population, wealth, or accommodations in the city. There are few places in the United States possessing greater commercial advantages than Washington; placed at the head of an excellent navigation, supported by an extensive and wealthy back country in Virginia and Maryland, and in a climate extremely healthy; if it has but fair play it will soon rival many of the most important towns in the Union, in wealth and population.

The public are greatly interested in promoting the welfare of the city, as it would make very valuable a large property given by the proprietors of the land on which the city stands, which at present is worth nothing. The proprietors of the city gave the land to the public, with an understanding that the sites for the public buildings should remain unchanged; therefore the present alteration would be unjust as to them. The States of Virginia and Maryland have both a deep stake in the permanency of the seat of Government. Virginia made a donation of $120,000, and a cession of a moiety of ten miles square of her territory, including a town which was the pride of the State. Maryland made a donation of $75,000 and a cession of a moiety of ten miles square of her territory, including a town, second to one only in the State; and these States will not view with complacency any act which may have a tendency to jeopardize the Seat of Government.

All the country within fifty miles of the seat of Government, both in Virginia and Maryland, are greatly interested in the welfare of the city, and representing, as I do, an adjoining district, whose property would diminish at least 50 per cent. in value, if the Government is removed, I trust I shall be excused for the solicitude I have manifested, and the time I have occupied in the discussion.

The amendment was also opposed by Messrs. MASON, FORSYTH, and others, and advocated by Messrs. GROSVENOR and WRIGHT.

The question having been taken after much debate, by yeas and nays, was decided—For the amendment 55, against it 77, as follows:

The effect of this decision is, that the public offices shall be rebuilt on their old sites.

Mr. BIGELOW moved to amend the bill so as to require the President, previously to expending the money to be appropriated, to cause to be laid before Congress a plan and estimates for the buildings; by which, he believed, one-half of the expense might be saved.

This motion was opposed as unnecessary, by Mr. LEWIS, and negatived—ayes 39.

Mr. FARROW assigned the reasons why he should vote against the bill; not because he was against rebuilding, but because of the great scarcity of money in the Treasury.

Mr. STANFORD moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to make some report as to concentration, and the manner and method of executing the provisions of the bill.

This motion was opposed by Mr. LEWIS, and negatived—ayes 44.

The question on ordering the bill to be read a third time, was then decided as follows:

THURSDAY, February 9.

Mr. FISK, of New York, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the rules of this House be so amended, that officers who have received, or shall hereafter receive, the thanks of Congress for their gallantry and good conduct, displayed in the service of their country, shall be admitted to seats within the walls of this House.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing, in the State of Kentucky, a loan office, and in such other States in which no such office is established.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to allow a drawback of duties on spirits distilled, and certain goods, wares, and merchandise, manufactured within the United States, on the exportation thereof to any foreign port or place." They have also passed the bill from this House "for the relief of Benjamin Wells and others," with amendments; in which bill and amendments they request the concurrence of this House.

An engrossed bill in addition to the act regulating the Post Office Establishment was read a third time; and the further consideration postponed till to-morrow.

PUBLIC ROADS.

Mr. LATTIMORE, from the committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of repairing and keeping in repair the road from Nashville to Natchez, as also the road from Fort Hawkins in Georgia, to St. Stephen's in the Mississippi Territory, delivered in a report, accompanied by a bill making an appropriation for repairing the road from Nashville to Natchez; which was read twice and committed. The report is as follows:

It appears, by a treaty concluded with the Choctaws on the 25th October, 1801, and another with the Choctaws on the 17th December in the same year, that the consent of these Indians was obtained to the opening of a wagon road through their respective lands; and by an act of Congress of the 21st April, 1806, that six thousand dollars was appropriated to this purpose; which was effected, as provided by those treaties and this act, under the direction of the President of the United States. It appears also by a treaty with the Creek Indians, concluded on the 14th November, 1805, that the United States have a right to a horse-path through their lands; and, by the act above-mentioned, that six thousand dollars was appropriated for the purpose of opening a road from the frontier of Georgia, on the route from Athens to New Orleans, as far as the thirty-first degree of north latitude; which was likewise effected, as provided, under the direction of the President of the United States.

Although the country through which these roads respectively pass is, naturally, as convenient for the purposes of transportation and intercourse as any other parts of the United States, yet, considering its great extent, it is not presumed that the appropriations heretofore made could have been considered as adequate to any other object than that of merely opening the roads. The necessary bridges over the streams, and the necessary causeways through the swamps on these extensive routes, would in the opinion of your committee require of themselves larger sums than those mentioned above.

Your committee deem it wholly unnecessary to offer any general remarks to show the great national advantages of an easy and certain intercourse between distant parts of the United States. The sense of Congress on this subject is already well ascertained, from the large and liberal appropriations bestowed on the great Western road from the Potomac to the Ohio river. Without entering into comparisons as to which parts of the Union most require the provident attention of Government, in relation to this subject, it appears to your committee that the improvement of the roads in question, under the direction and at the expense of the National Government, is at all times recommended by a consideration of the importance of the country to which they lead, as well as the want of both authority and means to make it in the territory through which they pass. At this time the subject is rendered unusually interesting, from the efforts of the enemy to seize upon the emporium of an immense country, as well as other positions in the same quarter of less, though great, importance to the United States. So long as the war continues, New Orleans and other adjacent parts will be liable to invasion, and will of course require no inconsiderable force for their defence. During such a state of things, it is highly desirable—indeed necessary—that good roads should facilitate the transmission of intelligence, as well as the march of troops and the transportation of supplies, when a passage by water may be too hardy or wholly impracticable.

The improvements of these roads being deemed expedient by your committee, the next inquiry is, in what way can this end be best obtained? How far it might be proper to effect this purpose by the incorporation of a turnpike company, your committee are not prepared to say. Several objections have presented themselves in considering such a plan; but whether, under other circumstances, it would be advisable or not, its slow execution would necessarily defer the advantages which, in the present state of affairs, it is desirable promptly to enjoy. As the immediate interest of the public is the particular consideration which induces your committee to recommend the improvement of these roads, and as they believe that it cannot be so well promoted in any other way as by a special appropriation, they have prepared a bill for the purpose of improving the road from Nashville to Natchez, which they ask leave to report.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The bill from the Senate making an appropriation for rebuilding or repairing the public buildings in the City of Washington was read a third time.

Mr. PICKERING spoke against the bill, on the general ground of opposition to the permanency of the seat of Government.

A motion was made by Mr. WEBSTER, that the said bill be recommitted to a select committee, with instructions so to alter the bill as to appropriate twenty thousand dollars to the preservation of the public buildings in the City of Washington, and to the improvement and repairs of the building in which Congress now sit, for its better accommodation therein—said sum to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated—and to strike out of the bill the appropriation of the sum of five hundred thousand dollars.

This motion was advocated by the mover, and by Messrs. GROSVENOR, GASTON, WRIGHT, and ALSTON; and opposed by Messrs. LEWIS, FISK of New York, RHEA of Tennessee, and McKIM. The debate was long and warmly contested by the affirmative side of the House.

The question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 67, nays 79, as follows:

Mr. TAYLOR moved that the said bill be recommitted to the Committee for the District of Columbia, with instructions to prepare and report to this House amendments for concentrating the public buildings, to be erected in the City of Washington, for the accommodation of the Government.

FRIDAY, February 10.

Mr. EPPEs, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1815; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EPPEs, from the same committee, also reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1815; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Charles Todd; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. YANCEY, from the same committee, reported a bill to authorize the payment for horses lost in the public service in the Northwestern army, or in the campaigns under Generals Jackson and Floyd, in the present war; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WOOD, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of John McMaster, reported a bill for the relief of John McMaster; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. FISK, of New York, the House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him yesterday, to amend the standing rules and orders of the House, and the same being again read and amended was agreed to, as follows, to wit:

Resolved, That the rules of this House be so amended, that officers who, by name, have received, or shall hereafter receive, the thanks of Congress for their gallantry and good conduct displayed in the service of their country, shall be admitted to seats within the hall of this House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "for the relief of Benjamin Wells and others," were read, and concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate, "to allow a drawback of duties on spirits distilled, and certain goods, wares, and merchandise, manufactured within the United States, on the exportation thereof to any foreign port of place," was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

An engrossed bill in addition to the act regulating the Post Office Establishment was read the third time and passed.

The House then, on motion of Mr. JACKSON of Virginia, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making provision for clothing the militia, called into the service of the United States; and, after some debate thereon, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

MONEY LOST BY A PAYMASTER.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of John Palmer Cox, which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next. The report is as follows:

That the petitioner is a paymaster to a regiment of New York militia commanded by Colonel Anthony D. Lameter, and which, in the month of August last, was stationed at Harlem Heights, in the city of New York; that he had received of the United States several thousand dollars, to pay off the militia, which he had deposited in a small trunk about eighteen inches in length, and which he usually kept locked up in a closet in his bed-chamber, until, by indisposition, he was confined to his bed, when he had the same brought and placed on the floor of the room, near the side of his bed; that, on the evening of the 31st of October last, the petitioner, and some other officers who lived in the room with him, went to a neighboring house to take tea, leaving the trunk in the room; and, when they returned, it was gone.

It appears from the depositions of Maria and Sophia Grenzeback, which were referred to the committee, that, on the 24th of December last they saw the trunk lying in the bushes, some distance from their father's house on Harlem Heights; and that, as soon as they saw it, they knew it at a distance to be the trunk of the petitioner.

They gave information to their father, who carried the trunk to his house, and sent for a Mr. Henry Post to come and open it, and view its contents. He opened the trunk, and found it contained $137 37½, and many papers belonging to the petitioner.

The petitioner states that he had in the trunk, at the time it was stolen, $2,587. One deponent swears that he verily believes that sum was in the trunk when it was taken; and another states that, on the evening the trunk was stolen, he saw the petitioner count the money, and, from the appearance, of the bundles of the bills, he believes there was that amount. The petitioner asks relief of Congress.

The committee are of opinion that to the prayer of the petitioner there are several objections:

1. That the loss of the money, and the amount thereof, are not clearly and satisfactorily shown.

2. That the loss, if it actually did take place, was under such circumstances as would constitute negligence on the part of the petitioner.

3. That if the money actually was stolen from the petitioner, without any negligence on his part, the United States would not be liable for it. It is believed they should not be considered the insurers of money in cases of this description; the same principle has often been established at the present and last session of Congress. They therefore recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be allowed.

TREASURY NOTES.

The House, on motion of Mr. EPPES, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. BRECKENRIDGE in the Chair, on the bill to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes, for 1815.

The bill was, on motion of Mr. EPPES, so amended as to provide for issuing Treasury notes to an amount not exceeding twenty-five millions of dollars; such of the notes as are of less amount than one hundred dollars, to be transferrable by delivery, (without endorsement,) and all notes of one hundred dollars or upwards, to bear an interest of five and two-fifths per cent.; the notes of the first description, in amounts of one hundred dollars and upwards, to be payable or redeemable in public stock to bear an interest of eight per cent.; those of the latter description to be payable or redeemable in public stock to bear an interest of seven per cent.

The bill, as first reported, proposed an issue of fifteen millions of notes, redeemable in five annual instalments of three millions each, as proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, for which the land tax was pledged. Connected with this plan, was the intention to propose a loan of twenty-five millions of dollars. The amendments last reported by the financial committee, are connected with a proposed loan of fifteen millions, thus reversing the proportion of loan and Treasury notes first proposed.

It was stated by Mr. EPPES, that the committee had, on further consideration, deemed a loan to so large an amount as of questionable practicability, and had therefore determined to increase the issue of Treasury notes, and proportionably reduce the loan, and therefore proposed the amendments which were now made to the bill.

The amendments having been reported to the House, were agreed to without debate or opposition; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

SUNDAY MAILS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, that it is inexpedient to make any alteration in the present regulations respecting the transportation and opening the mails on the Sabbath.

Mr. FARROW moved to amend the report so as to declare it expedient, instead of inexpedient, to grant the prayer of the petitioners. This motion was negatived without debate, and the Committee rose and reported the resolution unamended to the House.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, moved to lay the report on the table; which motion, after debate, was negatived.

Mr. KING then moved to add to the end of the resolution the words, "during the present war," so as to confine the resolve to the inexpediency of acting on the subject during the present war.

This motion was superseded by a motion of Mr. JACKSON, to postpone the further consideration of the resolution indefinitely, with a view to end the discussion of this subject for the present.

This motion was opposed by Mr. RHEA of Tennessee, Mr. MCKIM, and others, and subsequently withdrawn by the mover.

The question on Mr. KING's motion was decided in the negative. For the motion 52, against it 60, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Butler, Champion, Cilley, Condict, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Pennsylvania, Duvall, Ely, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Forsyth, Hale, Henderson, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hulbert, Jackson of Virginia, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lyle, Markell, Montgomery, Moseley, Nelson, Rugles, Schureman, Sherwood, Shipperd, Slaymaker, Smith of New York, Smith of Pennsylvania, Stanford, Stockton, Stuart, Sturges, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Wheaton, White, and Wood.

nessee, Rich, Ringgold, Roane, Sage, Sevier, Sharp, Smith of Virginia, Tannehill, Taylor, Udree, Williams, and Winter.

Mr. STANFORD then moved to amend the resolution by adding thereto the following: "so far as respects the progress of the mail and the issuing of letters on the Sabbath; but that the issuing of newspapers under the proper restrictions may be prohibited;" which motion was negatived.

The question on concurring in the resolution reported by the committee, was then decided by yeas and nays. For the report 81, against it 41, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alston, Avery, Barbour, Barnett, Bines, Brown, Cannon, Cilley, Clendenin, Comstock, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Desha, Duvall, Eppes, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Ingham, Jackson of Rhode Island, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Potter, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Roane, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Sherwood, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Smith of Virginia, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Williams, and Yancey.

NAYS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Butler, Champion, Condict, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Pennsylvania, Ely, Farrow, Geddes, Hale, Henderson, Hulbert, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Markell, Moseley, John Reed, Ruggles, Schureman, Shipperd, Slaymaker, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Taggart, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wharton, and Wilcox.

So it was resolved that it is inexpedient to grant the prayer of the petitioners.

SATURDAY, February 11.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the Eastern Branch Bridge Company; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred two resolutions of the House, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of changing certain collection districts, and a petition of sundry inhabitants of the county of Cumberland, in the State of Pennsylvania, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHN REED, from the Committee of Accounts, to whom was recommitted the bill to compel the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in the Congress of the United States, to give security for the faithful application and disbursement of the contingent fund of the said House, reported the same with an amendment; which was read, and concurred in; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time on Monday next.

Mr. EASTON, from the committee appointed on the 7th instant, reported a bill concerning the lead mines in the county of Washington, in the Territory of Missouri; which was twice read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Ordered, That Mr. CALHOUN be appointed of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in the place of Mr. CLARK, who is absent on leave.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire whether any regulations in the Army are necessary to their better accommodation and comfort.

The House resumed the consideration of Mr. JACKSON's bill providing for clothing the militia in the service of the United States; which was amended, and then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The engrossed bill to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes for the service of the year 1815, was read a third time, and passed.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the consideration of the bill from the Senate "giving further time to complete the surveys and obtain the patents for lands located under Virginia resolution warrants."

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

INDEMNITY TO COLLECTORS.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the petition of Jeremiah Hill, made the following report:

That the said Hill was indebted to the United States when he left the office of collector at Biddeford. He had officially obtained a judgment against certain persons, for breaches of the act of Congress laying an embargo, and claimed one moiety of the amount as collector. Before any money had been received on the judgment, he insisted on a right of set-off, and refused to pay the balance due from him into the Treasury. The Comptroller directed a suit to be instituted against him. It appears that the marshal had previously levied a part of the amount of the judgment claimed as an off-set by Hill; and that, pending the suit against him, lands were sold by the marshal to satisfy the residue. When the whole amount was received at the Treasury, Mr. Hill was allowed credit for his portion of the judgment, and the Comptroller directed a discontinuance of the suit against him, on the payment of costs. The petitioner claims—

1. The costs incurred in prosecuting the suit against the persons who committed the breach of the embargo law.

2. Reimbursement in the costs of the suit against himself.

3. Compensation for his trouble and expenses in attending to the two suits.

The defendants in the suit brought for the breach of the embargo law were liable for the legal costs of that suit; the petitioner was liable for the costs of the suit brought against himself, the United States not being bound to wait for the receipt of the amount of the judgment which he had obtained against others, before they instituted suit against him for money received as collector; and it appears to the committee that the personal service of the petitioners were amply remunerated by his moiety of the penalty incurred. The following resolution is therefore submitted:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted.

PUBLIC ROADS.

The bill from the Senate "in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio," passed through a Committee of the Whole, where it was amended by striking out "one hundred thousand dollars" (the additional sum appropriated) and inserting "twenty thousand."

The question, on concurring in this amendment, was decided by yeas and nays, and stood—for the amendment 62, against it 70, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Brown, Butler, Cannon, Cilley, Cooper, Crawford, Crouch, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Pennsylvania, Ely, Farrow, Forney, Franklin, Gaston, Geddes, Goldsborough, Henderson, Hulbert, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kennedy, Kent of New York, Kerr, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lefferts, Lovett, Markell, Moseley, Oakley, Pickering, Piper, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Ruggles, Schureman, Sherwood, Shipherd, Slaymaker, Stanford, Stockton, Strong, Stuart, Taggart, Taylor, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Yancey.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Bayly of Virginia, Bowen, Calhoun, Clendenin, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Cox, Creighton, Cuthbert, Desha, Duvall, Eppes, Findley, Fisk of New York, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hanson, Harris, Hashbrouck, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Hungerford, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent of Maryland, Kershaw, Kilbourn, Lewis, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Ormsby, Pearson, Pickens, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Roane, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Smith of Virginia, Telfair, Troup, Udree, White, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Winter, and Wright.

So the amendment was rejected; and the bill was ordered to a third reading; and was then read a third time, and passed.

MONDAY, February 13.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1815," with amendments; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Judiciary Committee, to whom was referred the inquiry into the expediency of increasing the salary of the District Judge of the State of Massachusetts, made a report unfavorable to an increase in this case, separate from the general class of such salaries; which was ordered to lie on the table.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the Senate announcing the passage of a bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America, was brought up, and the bill read a first and second time.

Mr. GASTON moved to refer the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with a view to the amendment of its details, which he pronounced to be incorrect and in many respects impracticable.

This motion was opposed by Mr. FORSYTH, and Mr. FISK of New York, who argued in favor of the correctness of the details of the bill, and denied that any other object but delay would be answered by the proposed reference.

The motion was negative, yeas 59, nays 70.

Mr. SHARP then moved to refer the bill to a select committee, with the following instructions:

1. To strike out all that part of the bill that allows fifteen millions of dollars of the capital of said Bank to be paid in six per cent. stock of the United States heretofore created and now in the hands of stockholders; and then amend the bill so as to allow the Government to take the said fifteen millions on their account.

2. That all the Government subscriptions shall be paid at five per cent. interest.

3. That the Government shall have a number of Directors in the said Bank equal to the proportion it may have of the capital of the Bank; who shall be appointed by the President of the United States.

4. That so long as the Bank shall not be required to pay specie for its notes or bills, or after having commenced paying of specie, shall from any cause stop the payment of the same, the Government shall not be required to pay to the Bank a higher rate of interest on any loans to Government, either as permanent loans or in anticipation of taxes, than four per cent.

5. That the Bank shall not be allowed to sell or transfer any part of the Government stock that it may acquire by permanent loans to Government, until the end of one year after the war.

In support of this motion, Mr. S. made a speech of nearly an hour in length.

Mr. FORSYTH replied to the principal points of this speech at considerable length.

Mr. SHARP explained.

Mr. OAKLEY expressed himself, in a speech of some length, as favorable to some of the objects of the motion of Mr. SHARP, and as preferring them generally to the present provisions of the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN, in a pithy speech of moderate length, expressed himself in favor of commitment, though friendly only to two of the proposed instructions, viz: the reduction of the interest on loans to the Government, and striking out the old stock. He assigned the reasons also why the plan of a bank now before the House did not meet his approbation.

MESSRS. HAWKINS, WRIGHT, RHEA, and FORSYTH, further opposed the commitment, and MESSRS. OAKLEY, BOWEN, and GASTON, advocated it.

The question on Mr. SHARP's motion having been divided, the question on reference to a select committee was taken separately from the instructions proposed to be given to the committee; and—

On the question of commitment, the vote stood, by yeas and nays, for commitment 75, against it 80, as follows:

Mr. GASTON then moved to refer the bill to a Committee of the Whole; which motion was decided as follows: For the motion 70, against it 84.

Mr. SHARP then moved to amend the bill by striking out so much as allows the subscription of stock heretofore created.

This motion was supported by Mr. DUVAL, and opposed by Messrs. WRIGHT and HUMPHREYS; and was negatived by yeas and nays. For the motion 72, against it 82, as follows:

Mr. SHARP further moved to amend the said bill by striking out of the 4th line of the 12th rule for the regulation of that institution, the word "six," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "four," being the maximum rate per centum per annum, at which the said institution may charge the Government upon loans.

And the question being taken thereon, it was also determined in the negative—yeas 74, nays 77, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. WEDNESDAY, February 15.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, rose to make a motion. Believing, he said, that the war was about to receive a termination, he felt it a duty to those brave patriots who, by their exertions, had placed the character of the country so high that we should never again be disturbed by any foreign Power, unless unhappily intestine division should afford an opportunity to an enemy, to move the following resolution, with a view to redeem the national pledge to those who had enlisted under the banners of their country to defend its soil and enforce its rights. He therefore moved—

"That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of laying off as much of the public lands as shall be necessary to satisfy the claims of the Army of the United States, and of fixing the location thereof."

Mr. W. said he should not press the consideration of this motion to-day, but call for it on some future day.

Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, offered for consideration the following resolution, which, he said, would speak for itself, and preclude the necessity of any elucidatory remarks:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House such information as he shall deem necessary to be communicated, touching the state of the relations existing between the United States and the Barbary Powers."

The resolution was agreed to nem. con., and a committee appointed to lay it before the President.

TUESDAY, February 16.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of Bowie and Kurtz, and others, late of the ship Allegheny, was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The resolutions from the Senate expressive of the high sense of Congress of the gallantry and good conduct of Commodore D. T. Patterson and Major Carmick, and the officers and men under their command in the defence of New Orleans, were twice read, and ordered to a third reading.

A resolution was received from the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee to inquire into the expediency of causing the Chambers, at present occupied by the two Houses of Congress or others in the same building, to be altered and fitted up for their better accommodation.

DEFENCE OF NEW ORLEANS.

The resolutions from the Senate expressive of the thanks of Congress to General Jackson and the troops under his command, for their gallantry in defence of New Orleans, were twice read and amended.

On the question of ordering these and the subsequent resolves to a third reading—

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, said, that he congratulated the House on the return of peace; if the peace be honorable, he might be permitted to congratulate the House on the glorious termination of the war. He might be permitted to congratulate them on the glorious termination of the most glorious war ever waged by any people. To the glory of it General Jackson and his gallant army have contributed not a little. I cannot, sir, perhaps language cannot, do justice to the merits of General Jackson, and the troops under his command, or to the sensibility of the House, I will therefore forbear to trouble the House with the usual prefatory remarks; it is a fit subject for the genius of Homer. But there was a spectacle connected with this subject upon which the human mind would delight to dwell—upon which the human mind could not fail to dwell with peculiar pride and exultation. It was the yeomen of the country marching to the defence of the city of Orleans, leaving their wives, and children, and firesides, at a moment's warning. On the one side, committing themselves to the bosom of the mother of rivers: on the other, taking the route of the trackless and savage wilderness for hundreds of miles. Meeting at the place of rendezvous—seeking, attacking, and beating the enemy in a pitched battle—repulsing three desperate assaults with great loss to him—killing, wounding, and capturing more than four thousand of his force—and finally compelling him to fly, precipitately, the country he had boldly invaded. The farmers of the country triumphantly victorious over the conquerors of the conquerors of Europe. "I came, I saw, I conquered," says the American husbandman, fresh from his plough. The proud veteran who triumphed in Spain, and carried terror into the warlike population of France, was humbled beneath the power of my arm. The God of Battles and of Righteousness took part with the defenders of their country, and the foe was scattered before us as chaff before the wind. It is, indeed, a fit subject for the genius of Homer, of Ossian, or Milton.

That militia should be beaten by militia is of natural and ordinary occurrence; that regular troops should be beaten by militia is not without example; the examples are as numerous, or more numerous, in our own country, than in any other; but that regular troops, the best disciplined and most veteran of Europe, should be beaten by undisciplined militia with the disproportionate loss of a hundred to one, is, to use the language of the commanding General, almost incredible. The disparity of the loss, the equality of force, the difference in the character of the force, all combine to render the battle of the eighth of January at once the most brilliant and extraordinary of modern times. Nothing can account for it but the rare merits of the commanding General, and the rare patriotism and military ardor of the troops under his command.

Glorious, sir, as are these events to the American arms, honorable as they are to the American character, they are not more glorious and honorable than are the immediate consequences full of usefulness to the country. If the war had continued, the men of the country would have been inspired with a noble ardor and a generous emulation in defence of the country; they would have struck terror into the invader, and given confidence to the invaded. Europe has seen that, to be formidable on the ocean, we need but will it. Europe will see that, to be invincible on land, it is only necessary that we judiciously employ the means which God and Nature have bountifully placed at our disposal. The men of Europe, bred in camps, trained to war, with all the science and all the experience of modern war, are not a match for the men of America taken from the closet, the bar, the court-house, and the plough. If, sir, it be pardonable at any time to indulge these sentiments and feelings, it may be deemed pardonable on the present occasion.

I think the resolution of the Senate defective; it does not record the prominent fact which, more than any other, contributes to the brilliancy of General Jackson's triumph—the fact that the triumph was the triumph of militia over regular troops; on the contrary, it is so worded, that strangers or posterity, deriving their knowledge from the record itself, would be led to believe that the regular troops constituted the principal force, and that the militia was only auxiliary. If the House should consider the defect as important, I would move to amend the resolution.

Mr. ROBERTSON spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, representing alone on this floor an interesting part of our country, saved by heroism unmatched from horrors which cannot be described, I shall be excused for expressing my admiration of General Jackson, his great achievements, and the splendid battles which we now commemorate.

Permit me too, sir, to avail myself of this occasion to pour forth the gratitude with which I am impressed, not only for the protection of Louisiana, but for the opportunity which has been afforded her citizens of displaying a zeal, a patriotism, and an unanimity, which command the applause of an admiring nation.

Scarce three months are past, since a mighty armada, with troops accustomed to victory, the well fleshed myrmidons of sanguinary European wars, with others collected in the West India Islands, from their description intended to produce terror, led on by chiefs whose fame had filled the universe, directed its course across the Atlantic with a view to desolate a distant portion of our country. They calculated on an easy conquest; never were hopes more confident—never were hopes more effectually blasted.

Pursuing their insidious system, they issued proclamations and sent forth emissaries, to corrupt the unwary, and excite disaffection. They offered to those who should be weak enough to confide in their perfidious promises, protection and liberty under a British constitution. Insolent thought! To whom were those offers addressed? To Americans, who themselves, or whose fathers had once before chased them from their shores covered with disgrace and overwhelmed with dismay. To whom were they addressed? To the natives of Louisiana—to Frenchmen, and their descendants. The English dared to speak to them of peace and fraternity, holding in their hand a sword reeking, as it had reeked for centuries, with the blood of Frenchmen.

Hasty levies of half-armed undisciplined militia, from the interior of our vast continent, from the banks of the Tennessee, the Cumberland, and the Ohio, traversing wide and trackless regions, precipitate themselves to the scene of conflict, resolute to defend their distant brethren from the dangers with which they were menaced. There the hardy sons of the West, with the yeomanry of the adjacent territory and the invaded State, with a handful of regulars and a few armed vessels, constituted that force from which the tremendous armament of our enemy was to experience the most signal overthrow the world has ever witnessed. But Jackson was their leader, and though inexpert in scientific warfare, they were animated by something more valuable than discipline, more irresistible than all the energy which mere machinery can display; they were animated by patriotism—by that holy enthusiasm which surmounts all difficulties and points the way to triumph. Happy if a parallel to their conduct may be found, it must be looked for in the achievements of those who like themselves fought for the liberties of their country. History records, to the consolation of freemen, that the Poles, unarmed and ignorant of tactics, beat the veteran troops of Frederick and Catharine in many pitched battles, never less than three times their numbers—but their leader was Kosciusko. In the early stages of the revolution, the peasantry of France, under Custine and Dumourier, repulsed from their soil the disciplined thousands of the Duke of Brunswick; but it was not the Poles, nor the Frenchmen—it was love of country—it was the cause.

Foiled in their attempt to disseminate distrust and treachery, they now prepared to take by force what fraud had failed to secure.

The defence of Fort Bowyer, the battle of their hundred well manned barges, with five of our gunboats, were a foretaste of what they were further to expect. But, flushed with thoughts of the full fruition of their hopes, they pushed forward to seize the prize just presented to their grasp. They passed unseen through narrow defiles and deep morasses; evaded the natural defence of the State, and found themselves quietly posted on the fertile banks of the Mississippi, in full view of the alluring metropolis of Louisiana, where they had been promised plunder without check and riot without restraint.

Among the wonderful occurrences of that eventful period, the simultaneous arrival at the same distant point of the brave defenders of their country and the daring invader, cannot be considered less miraculous. Confident in its strength, and contemptuous of its foe, the veteran army was unprepared for the reception that awaited it. Suddenly and fiercely attacked, panic struck at the unlooked for blow, they were defeated by half their number of raw American troops. This was conclusive. Their subsequent conduct exhibited little else than a tissue of blunders and misfortunes, or of courageous efforts which recoiled with ruin on themselves.

At length the time arrived which was to witness the most extraordinary event recorded in military annals. On the 8th of January, a day destined to form an era in history, this army of invincibles, led on by gallant chiefs, advanced to the charge with firm step, according to methods most approved—trenches hastily thrown up, defended by what they considered a mob, a vagabond militia, promised an enterprise destitute alike of hazard and of honor. They were met by an incessant and murderous discharge of musketry and artillery, the whole line was a continued sheet of fire; intrepidity stood appalled—their General slain—the ditch filled—the field strewn with the dying and the dead—a miserable remnant of their thousands fled back to their entrenchments. The battle closed, a battle whose character, from the nature of the troops engaged and the disparity of loss, is the most wonderful, whose effects are as important as any that was ever fought. And now we are invited to the contemplation of a scene which reflects immortal honor on the inhabitants of New Orleans, and, by contrast, eternal shame on the enemy.

The dead were interred, the agonies of the dying assuaged, the wounded relieved; that property which was to have been given up to plunder was willingly yielded to their wants, and the very individuals, the marked victims of their licentiousness, vied with each other in extending to them every proof of tenderness and humanity.

It was my intention, Mr. Speaker, to have adverted to the manner in which the English have carried on their war, particularly to their views in regard to New Orleans, but peace is this moment announced; I do not wish to mar the feelings which belong to it; if I cannot forget their atrocities, I disdain to triumph over a disgraced and fallen foe. Whilst resuming my seat I take much satisfaction in doing justice to the indefatigable exertions of the Secretary of War. From the time of his taking charge of that Department, and of being apprized of the danger which threatened Louisiana, no efforts were spared, no applications unattended to, which had for their object the protection of that State.

Mr. INGERSOLL said: Mr. Speaker, I regret that these resolutions require any amendment. I am persuaded, however, that their final passage will be unanimous. The House will excuse me, I hope, if I indulge myself in a few observations on this occasion. I speak impromptu, sir, without premeditation—I have found it impossible to think—I have been able only to feel these last three days. The unexpected, the grateful termination of the glorious struggle we have just concluded, is calculated to excite emotions such as can be understood by those only who can feel them. For the first time during this long, arduous and trying session, we can all feel alike—we are all of one mind—all hearts leap to the embraces of each other. Such a spectacle as that now exhibited by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America was never presented to the world before. While the Senate are ratifying a treaty of peace, the House of Representatives are voting heartfelt thanks to those noble patriots, those gallant citizen soldiers who have crowned that peace with imperishable lustre. The terms of the treaty are yet unknown to us. But the victory at Orleans has rendered them glorious and honorable, be they what they may. They must be honorable under such a termination of the war. Those Commissioners who have afforded us such signal credentials of their firmness heretofore, cannot possibly have swerved. The Government has not betrayed its trust. The nation now cannot be discredited. It has done its duty, and is above disgrace. Within five and thirty years of our national existence, we have achieved a second acknowledgment of our national sovereignty. In the war of the Revolution we had allies—in arms—reinforcements from abroad on our own soil—and the wishes of all Europe on our side. But in this late conflict we stood single-handed. Not an auxiliary to support us—not a bosom in Europe that dared beat in our behalf—not one but what was constrained to stifle its hopes, if it entertained any in our favor. The treaty signed at Paris on the 30th of last May placed us in a situation of the utmost emergency. England had triumphed over France—and she turned upon us with her hands full of the implements of destruction—her heart almost bursting with vengeance and fury—malediction in her manifestoes, subjugation on her sword. We have already voted thanks to those heroes of the North, who, in Canada, faced and broke the spell of English invincibility. From the North the tempest rolled on to this neighborhood: And it was in the midst of the ruins—the cinders—of this Capital, which became the momentary prize of a successful incursion—it was at a period the most awful, under difficulties the most appalling, that preparations were made to meet the final, the concentrated onset at New Orleans—the most remote, the weakest point of our territories—the most vulnerable—the hardest to hold, and the hardest to regain, if once lost. For the capture of that city a most formidable force was embodied. All the disposable troops to be spared by England from Europe, the detachments scattered along our coasts, all the garrisons and troops that could be collected from the West India Islands, were concentrated for this last and grand object. The gallant and generous inhabitants of the West flew to arms. It was not their firesides they had to defend. It was in many cases more than a thousand, in all more than five hundred miles from home they were to seek the scene of their exploits. They went with an immortalizing alacrity of patriotism. Every man of them is entitled to a panegyric. There is no distinction but that of rank to be made between them and their wary, their consummate commander. Hardly arrived in New Orleans when the enemy appeared, they instantly attacked him—and in the night time. The result of this immediate intrepidity was their striking a salutary respect into the invaders. The conquerors of Europe sent the flower of their armies, under the most eminent of their commanders, on this expedition. On the 28th December and the 1st of January, attempts were made to carry the American lines—but without success, without impression. Finding that their men had learned a reluctance to attack from these experiments, the British officers, on the memorable 8th, threw themselves into the front and led on to the charge. It is this that alone can account for the enormous effusion of officers' blood. Not relying on the example thus set, they added moreover those enticements which, at Badajoz and St. Sebastian, had seduced the soldiers to success. They offered beauty and booty—in other words, rape and rapine, as the reward of victory. Thus led and thus invited, the British army made its storm. Their discomfiture is without example. Never was there such a disparity of loss. With the tidings of this triumph from the South, to have peace from the East, is such a fullness of gratification as must overflow all hearts with gratitude to the Giver of all good—to that Being who has saved us from the enemy, who has saved us from all harms. Not to be grateful would be impious—

Compensation to Collectors.

not to triumph, cold and churlish indeed. England has conquered Europe. In the midst of her conquests she is discontented and unhappy. Europe, relieved from French dominion, is already enslaved afresh, cruelly enslaved. Poland, the richest, finest country on that Continent, with a population romantically free and patriotic, is annexed to Russia. After fighting the battles of France for the pay of emancipation, Poland falls under the Russian yoke. Saxony, one of the most ancient and respectable of the sovereignties of Europe, is subjoined as a province to Prussia, the most recent, the most despicable of all the European powers—a Kingdom which found a transient consequence in the genius of the great Frederick, which never can be considerable without such a genius to sustain it. The Italians are torn from their homes to serve in Austrian armies. Norway dislocated from Denmark to be forced into the arms of Sweden—France is unsettled—Spain convulsed—Holland swelled into an ephemeral magnitude. What a contrast with this happy, thriving, blessed country! Who does not rejoice that he is not an European! Who is not proud to feel himself an American—our wrongs revenged—our rights recognised! For I repeat, that no matter what the terms of the treaty may be, the effects of this war must be permanently prosperous and honorable. The catastrophe at Orleans has fixed an impress, has sealed, has consecrated the compact beyond the powers of parchment and diplomacy. At sea a tide of triumphs—by land a Continent on which the enemy could gain no foothold. Your Navy transcendent in achievements—your Army at length equalling your Navy. Mr. Speaker, for the richest Kingdom in Europe I would not exchange my American citizenship—for the most opulent endowment I would not surrender the delight which I derive from the feelings of this moment. Let us then pass, let us vote by acclamation, the thanks of Congress to General Jackson and his companions in victory.

I cannot resume my seat, sir, without a word of merited eulogium on an individual not comprehended in these resolutions, but to whom the nation is greatly indebted for this success. I mean the present Secretary at War. From the monumental dilapidations of this Capital, with enemies to provide against on all quarters, those arrangements were made and those aids afforded by the Government which mainly contributed to the glorious result at Orleans. Jackson, to be sure, and his cohort banded together from all regions by his powerful ascendancy, were the executors—but the able and honest statesman, who now holds the War Department, was the author and originator of the preparations. Let us therefore—I hope all will agree to it—let us consider him too in our applause.

The resolutions from the Senate expressive of the high sense entertained by Congress of the patriotism and good conduct of the people of Louisiana and New Orleans during the late military operations before that city, were twice read, and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. ROBERTSON said he was prevented from taking any part in regard to them, by feelings that would be properly appreciated. He would content himself with expressing the high sense he entertained of the very complimentary terms in which his constituents were mentioned. If suspicions had heretofore been indulged in, derogatory to the history of Louisiana, they would no longer exist. If cold calculations had been made of her value and importance in the Union, they would no more be heard.

COMPENSATION TO COLLECTORS.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported by the Committee of the whole House to the bill to fix the compensations and increase the responsibility of the collectors of the direct tax and internal duties, and for other purposes connected with the collection thereof.

The said amendments being read, and that to the first section being under consideration, Mr. EPPES moved to amend the same, by striking out the word "three," being the rate per centum of the compensation to collectors, upon all moneys not exceeding $50,000 accounted for, and paid into the Treasury, between the first day of July, 1815, and the first day of January, 1816, and inserting the words four and a half."

And the question being taken thereon, it was passed in the affirmative—yeas 81, nays 62, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Mr. STANFORD then moved to amend the said amendment to the first section, by adding thereto the following proviso:

Provided, That no collector in any city shall receive a greater compensation than $5,000, nor any collector in the country more than $2,500.

Mr. FISK, of New York, moved to amend the said proviso, by striking out the word "five," in the maximum of the compensation to a city collector, and inserting, in lieu thereof, the word "eight." And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 2, nays 131, as follows:

FRIDAY, February 17.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill supplemental to the act, entitled "An act for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana, and Territory of Missouri," approved the 12th of April, 1814; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PICKERING, from the committee to whom was committed the bill granting a donation of three hundred and twenty acres of land to Anthony Shane, reported the same with an amendment; which was read and agreed to by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The bill from the Senate to give further time to complete surveys and locate patents for lands granted under Virginia resolution warrants, was read a third time and passed.

The engrossed bill to lay a direct tax on the District of Columbia, was read a third time, without debate, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the appointment of a district attorney and marshal for the Northern District of the State of New York.

The resolution from the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee to inquire into the expediency of causing the Chambers at present occupied by the two Houses of Congress, or others in the same building, to be altered and fitted up for their better accommodation, was read, and agreed to by the House; and Mr. LEWIS, Mr. MACON, and Mr. KENT, of Maryland, were appointed the committee on the part of the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Edward Hallowell. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

THE ARMY AND NAVY.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, submitted the following resolutions for consideration:

2. Resolved, That the said Committee be further instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, provision ought to be made, by law, for allowing — months' extra pay and a donation in land to the officers of the Army who may be disbanded.

3. Resolved, That the said Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing one or more additional military schools.

4. Resolved, That the Naval Committee be instructed to inquire and report to what extent the Navy of the United States on the Lakes can be reduced consistently with the public interest.

5. Resolved, That the said Committee be further instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing one or more naval academies.

6. Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to ascertain and report whether any, and, if any, what, modification of existing laws are necessary to adapt them to the State of our relations with foreign nations.

The House having agreed to consider these resolutions,

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, made a few remarks in respect to each of these resolutions, the whole of which the reporter was not fortunate enough to hear. They were of an explanatory nature.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved that these resolutions should lie on the table. The consummation of the peace, he said, had not taken place, and it appeared to him, therefore, improper now to enter into a discussion of them.

Mr. CANNON also considered them premature. It would certainly be time enough for the House to act on them when they found the ratification had actually taken place. Before that time, he was opposed to any discussion of the subjects embraced in the resolutions.

Mr. GROSVENOR said, sensible as he was of the force of the motive, which has prompted the motion, viz: the brevity of the remainder of the session, yet he considered the motion entirely premature. As individuals, the members of the House knew the fact of a ratification of a treaty of peace; but the nature of the treaty was not known, nor was the fact officially before the House.

FEBRUARY, 1815.

Defence of New Orleans.

H. OF R.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, said he could not see any strong objections to laying the resolutions on the table; though he could see no objections to acting on them on the score of a regard to the dignity of the House. Could any evil grow out of an inquiry into the subject? There was no danger of precipitation in acting on this or any other subject; for even now, at the close of the session, at this interesting moment, the House had employed two days in debating what compensation should be allowed to the collectors of the taxes. True dignity, Mr. G. said, always consists in doing what you intend to do, promptly, and with a good grace.

Mr. FISK, of New York, desired to see added to these resolves another, contemplating provision for the widows and orphans of officers who have fallen in the war.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, thought the agitation of these questions ought to be delayed until the House had, from the proper authority, official information of the peace. In their capacity of representatives, Mr. R. said, they knew nothing of what had taken place, whatever they might have individually heard. The treaty, when communicated, would probably be attended with other information, properly relative to the subject, and which the House ought to take into consideration.

Mr. HANSON said there could not be a doubt but it would be improper to act on this subject till official information was received, which the House now had not. It was almost a maxim, he said, that precipitancy is always unjustifiable. How did they know that the Executive had made up his mind to ratify the treaty? Mr. H. went on to repeat what were reported to be the characteristics of the treaty; but, on the suggestion that this debate was not strictly applicable at this time, refrained from pursuing the topic. He said, however, that he thought the House ought not to act on the subject as if it was pre-determined to accept the treaty, be it good or bad. To act on these resolutions now, would have an undignified appearance.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table.

On the question to print them, there were for printing them 57, against it 58.

DEFENCE OF NEW ORLEANS.

The resolutions expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Andrew Jackson, and the troops under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the defence of New Orleans, were read a third time.

The resolution expressive of the high sense entertained by Congress of the patriotism and good conduct of the people of Louisiana and New Orleans, was also read a third time.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, expressed in a feeling manner his high sense of the complimentary manner in which his constituents were mentioned in this resolve; and flattered himself they would never forfeit, at any time, the high character they had now acquired.

Mr. SHARP then rose, and addressed the House as follows: Mr. Speaker, the subject those resolutions present for our consideration, is the most interesting occurrence in the history of our country.

The people of Louisiana, approached by an enemy who suspected their fidelity to their newly adopted Government, and who held out every allurements that could be presented to seduce them from the Union, at this very moment whilst assailed by the blandishments of the enemy, with open arms they received their fellow-citizens who came to their aid, and, by voluntary contributions, furnished everything necessary to their comfort, while exposed in the open field in defence of their city. Yet their patriotism and humanity are surpassed by their bravery. On the 23d of December, it was a company of Louisianians that penetrated the very centre of the enemy's camp, and made good their retreat, and brought off a number of prisoners. On the 8th of January, the Louisianians aided in defending the breastworks on the right, and when the enemy got possession of one of our bastions, they were among the foremost who met them; and, amidst the clash of swords and bayonets, grappled with them on the ramparts, and bore them into the ditch.

If we compare the conduct of Louisiana with any other part of the nation—even the oldest and best established in their political institutions—so far from losing anything in the comparison, it is on their part splendid and honorable, and must effectually put down all those feelings of distrust and jealousy that have been entertained in some parts of the Union in relation to their adoption into our Republic.

In another point of view this subject is still more interesting. There is, perhaps, no epoch to be found on the historic page, none in the history of America in which we have been called upon to present the thanks of the American people to a whole State. Louisiana, the youngest daughter of the Union, composed of a population most of whom had tasted of liberty but yesterday; it had not been their birthright, but such are the charms of liberty to a people who have felt its blessings and known its value, that, on the approaching of a foe to enslave them, the whole population of Louisiana are bristling with the bayonet; the old men, the exempt, are clad in mail, and rushing to meet the foe.

"If humanity shows to the God of the world,

A sight for his fatherly eye,

It is when a people, with banner unfurl'd,

Resolve for their freedom to die."

Such a spectacle was presented by the State of Louisiana. As we are ever to expect, in so just a cause, they received the benedictions of Heaven, and, under its benign influence, aided by their fellow-citizens in arms, they not only triumphed over but almost exterminated their enemy.

Can there be an American, whose bosom does not beat high with joy to call Louisiana a legitimate daughter of the Union, and hail her citizens as brothers?

Is there any part of the American empire that could hesitate ever hereafter to hold Louisiana in the maternal embrace of the nation; to extend to her our care and protection?

The resolutions were then unanimously passed.

The resolution expressive of the high sense entertained by Congress of the merits of Commodore D. T. Patterson, Major Daniel Carmick, and the officers and men under their command, were read a third time, and passed, with one negative, (Mr. McKee, of Kentucky.)

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate, "to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America."

Mr. FORSYTH moved to refer the bill to a select committee.

Mr. LOWNDES superseded this motion, by a motion to postpone the bill indefinitely. He made this motion, not from any hostility to a National Bank, wishing, as the gentleman did, that a National Bank should be established, but because he wished it to be done at a time and under circumstances which would give the House ability to decide correctly on the subject. He believed, he said, and he was not alone in that opinion, that the present moment was a most unfavorable one for the establishment of a bank. It must be known that, long as the subject of a bank had been agitated, there had been important differences of sentiment as to the principles of such an institution, which had been suppressed because of the pressure of the times. Among other objections to acting on this subject at present, he said, it was no trifling one that the suspension of specie payments by the State banks, which every one considered an evil, would unquestionably be prolonged by it. In the fragment of the session which now remains, there would not be time to enter into a consideration of these points; and, if there were full time, the mere circumstance of the new and almost insuperable difficulties arising from a new state of things which now present themselves, ought to suggest a reason for postponement. Congress could not now establish a bank half so eligible, or half so durable, as they could at a future session.

Mr. FORSYTH said, he was perfectly aware that the subject of a National Bank was attended with great difficulty at this or any other session; but his opinion was, that this was the best time for an attempt of this kind. The subject had been so much discussed, that he apprehended every gentleman was prepared to decide on it without much further discussion. It was from a hope that all sides of the House could now come to some understanding, and agree on the establishment of such an institution as should be not only valuable to the United States, but satisfactory to all parties, that he had now moved to commit the bill, which he hoped would not be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. GASTON conceived there would be less difficulty in acting on this subject at the present session than was anticipated by the gentleman from South Carolina. The subject has been so repeatedly discussed, that he thought it could be acted on more advantageously in the small remnant of the present session than in the first session of a new Congress, bringing together individuals not acquainted with each others' views, and not having the advantage of hearing the subject frequently discussed. Having always been friendly to such an institution, and believing it as important in peace as in war, he hoped an experiment would be made by referring this subject to a committee, which, whether successful or not, would not consume much time of the House.

MESSRS. GROSVENOR, PICKERING, and FARROW, also advocated the postponement; and Messrs. KILBOURN, FISK of Vermont, CALHOUN, and TELFAIR, opposed it.

On the question of postponement, which was decided by yeas and nays, the vote stood—yeas 74, nays 73, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Champion, Ciley, Clopton, Cooper, Crawford, Cuthbert, Davenport, Desha, Ely, Eppes, Farrow, Franklin, Geddes, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Grosvenor, Hale, Hall, Hashrouck, Hawes, Henderson, Hulbert, Jackson of Rhode Island, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lowndes, Macon, Markell, McKee, Montgomery, Mosely, Nelson, Ormsby, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, Wm. Reed, Roane, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Shoffey, Shipherd, Slaymaker, Smith of New York, Stanford, Stockton, Stuart, Taggart, Thompson, Troup, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Williams, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Alston, Anderson, Bayly of Virginia, Bines, Bowen, Breckenridge, Brown, Butler, Caperton, Calhoun, Cannon, Clendenin, Comstock, Conard, Cox, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Duvall, Earle, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Gaston, Gholson, Gourdin, Griffin, Hanson, Hawkins, Hubbard, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Ingham, Jackson of Virginia, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, Lefferts, Lewis, Lovett, Lyle, McCoy, McLean, Moore, Murfree, Newton, Parker, Pearson, Pickens, Piper, Pleasant, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Sharp, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Sturges, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Udree, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wood, and Yancey.

So the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Some time was spent in Committee of the Whole on the bill respecting the compensation of collectors of taxes, &c., and some material amendments having been moved to its details, it was ordered to lie on the table.

The remainder of the day was spent in Committee on the bill respecting post offices.

SATURDAY, February 18.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the bill from the Senate, "to allow a drawback of duties on spirits distilled, and certain goods, wares, and merchandise, manufactured within the United States, on the exportation thereof to any foreign port or place," without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. E., from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Solomon Frazer, and the representatives of Charles Eccleston; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. E. also reported a bill for the relief of William P. Bennett, of the State of New York; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CULPEPER submitted the following preamble and resolution; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

It being a duty peculiarly incumbent, in a time of public calamity and war, humbly and devoutly to acknowledge our dependence on Almighty God, and to implore his aid and protection; and, in times of deliverance and prosperity, to manifest our deep and undiminished gratitude to the Almighty Sovereign of the Universe: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That a joint committee of both Houses wait on the President of the United States, and request that he recommend a day of thanksgiving, to be observed by the people of the United States with religious solemnity, and the offering of devout acknowledgments to God for his mercies, and in prayer for the continuance of his blessings.

An engrossed bill granting a donation of three hundred and twenty acres of land to Anthony Shane, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Edward Halliwell was read the third time, and passed.

Ordered, That the bill to authorize a donation of land to persons employed in the military service of the enemy, who shall come within the United States and claim the protection of the Government thereof, and the bill to provide for the further defence of the frontiers of the United States by authorizing the President to augment the Military Establishment, be postponed indefinitely.

Ordered, That the resolution expressive of the sense of Congress of the gallantry and good conduct with which the reputation of the arms of the United States has been sustained by Major General Jackson, and the officers and men under his command, be postponed indefinitely.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Joshua Sands. The bill was reported with an amendment; which was concurred in by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

The bill to alter and establish certain post roads, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Henry Nimmo, passed through a Committee of the Whole, was ordered to a third reading, and read a third time, and passed accordingly.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "for the relief of Isaac Smith and Bratton Caldwell." And they have passed a bill "to authorize the settlement and payment of certain claims for the services of the militia;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

NATIONAL OBSERVATORY.

Mr. NELSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the second instant, the petition of William Lambert, and other documents relating to the establishment of a first meridian for the United States, made a report; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was amended, and concurred in by the House.

The report is as follows:

That the reasons detailed in the said reports appearing to be well founded, your committee have no hesitation in declaring their full assent to them. It is also the opinion of the committee that the plan proposed by the memorialist ought to be carried into complete effect, whenever attention to objects of a pressing nature and more immediate importance to the welfare of our country will permit, by the erection of a national observatory, and providing suitable instruments and apparatus at the public expense, to enable skilful persons to determine the places of the moon, planets, and other heavenly bodies with sufficient accuracy, by repeated and careful observations of the times of their transit over the meridian of the place.

It further appears that the memorialist has made calculations, in addition to those presented to this House in the month of December, 1809, from data afforded by the occultations of two fixed stars by the moon, which happened in January, 1793, and January, 1813; also, from the external and internal contacts of the sun and moon, in an annular solar eclipse on the 17th of September, 1811, which have all been referred to the Capitol, in the City of Washington; and that the mean result of the longitude is found to be nearly $76^{\circ} 55' 45''$, or five hours seven minutes and forty-three seconds in time west of Greenwich observatory, in England.

It has been represented that astronomical calculations subsequent to the close of the year 1812, can be depended upon with greater assurance of the accuracy of their results than before that period, in consequence of the publication and introduction into use of improved solar and lunar tables, constructed by M. de Lambre, of Paris, in France, and introduction into use of improved solar and lunar tables, constructed by M. de Lambre, of Paris, in France, and M. Burg, of Vienna, in Germany. This circumstance will suggest the propriety of authorizing additional experiments to be made, by approved methods of computation, to test the accuracy of the result found by William Lambert. Under this impression, the committee submit to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause such further observations to be made by competent persons residing at the seat of the National Government as may be deemed most proper to determine the longitude of the Capitol, in the City of Washington, with the greatest practicable degree of exactness, and that the data, with abstracts of the calculations, and the results founded thereon, be laid before Congress at their next session.

The remainder of the day was spent in the discussion of the bill declaratory of the powers of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory; several propositions to amend and postpone it were rejected, but, before getting through the bill, the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 26.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a petition of William Thornton, Superintendent of the Patent Office, praying for an increase of compensation, and that letters and communications to and from that office may not be charged with postage.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act for the better organization of the Courts of the United States within the State of New York;" which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. BOWEN, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill concerning invalid pensioners; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate, "to authorize the settlement and payment of certain claims for the services of the militia," was read the first time, and, on motion, the said bill was read the second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill declaratory of the powers of the Legislature of the Territory of Illinois: whereupon, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill to alter and establish certain post roads was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Joshua Sands was read the third time, and passed.

The order of the day on Mr. RICH's resolution for classifying persons liable to the direct tax, and allowing them to furnish soldiers in lieu of the same, was, on motion of its author, indefinitely postponed.

A message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting copies of the Treaty of Peace and Amity between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, which was signed by the Commissioners of both parties at Ghent, on the 24th December, 1814, and the ratifications of which have been duly exchanged.—The Message was read, and 5,000 copies of the Message and Treaty ordered to be printed. [See Senate proceedings, ante, p. 255, for the Message.]

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "to amend the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same;" and the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, and on gold and silver watches," with amendments; and they have passed a bill, "increasing the compensation allowed to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate;" in which amendments and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

MILITARY AND CREEK LANDS.

Mr. HARRIS moved the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to report a bill with provisions for having the boundary lines of the lands ceded to the United States by the Creek Treaty, recently ratified, run and marked, and having the same laid off into sections and quarter-sections, preparatory to the sale thereof, and for making an appropriation for defraying the expenses incident thereto.

Mr. HUMPHREYS remarked, that there was already in existence a general law authorizing the laying off of lands, &c., and that so much of this resolve as embraced that object was unnecessary; an appropriation of money only was necessary to enable the President to carry the law into effect.

Mr. HARRIS said, that, although there might be such a law as his colleague had described, it was proper that the land in question should be immediately laid off; and used a number of arguments to show that the people of Tennessee, who had conquered these lands for the United States, should, as soon as possible, have access to the waters of Mobile, which could only be obtained by a sale and settlement of the lands recently acquired, &c.

Mr. McKEE said, that, as soon as the treaty with the Indians was proclaimed, the Committee on the Public Lands had turned their attention to this subject, and, on examination, had found that no legal provision was necessary to the laying off, and surveying of these lands, and that an appropriation of money only was necessary for the purpose. In answer to a letter addressed to the Commissioner of the General Land Office on the subject, Mr. McK. said he had been informed it was first necessary that the boundaries of the Indian lands, and those of the United States, should be first surveyed and marked, before the lands were laid off. To enable the Government to proceed in it, an appropriation of money only was necessary.

Mr. HUMPHREYS said, that, as respected the settlement of the Creek territory, it was important not only to the people of Tennessee, but to the United States, in order to facilitate the intercourse between the United States and Louisiana, and to give security to the frontier, and cut off the influence of the Spanish Government and British traders over that country. But, as nothing more than an appropriation for the expenses of survey was necessary to that object, he moved to amend Mr. HARRIS's motion, so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the necessity and expediency of making an appropriation of money to meet the expenses of surveying and laying off the military bounty lands, and the lands lately ceded by the Creek Indians to the United States, in the Treaty of Fort Jackson, in order to the settlement thereof by the citizens of the United States.

FEBRUARY, 1815.

Widow of Elbridge Gerry.

H. OF R.

This motion was opposed by Mr. HARRIS. He contended for the propriety of a special law on the subject, which should define the duty of the Executive, in this respect, beyond doubt. The President now possessed authority to act on the subject, it was true, but he might not conceive the law obligatory as to these lands, unless Congress gave special direction in regard to them. The importance of the object was such, that he was not willing to leave anything to construction or uncertainty.

Mr. McKEE again contended that no further provision than an appropriation was necessary, unless it was intended to impose a penalty on the Executive for a failure to exercise the authority in this respect vested in him by a general law.

Mr. HUMPHREYS' amendment prevailed; and, as amended, the motion was agreed to.

WIDOW OF ELBRIDGE GERRY.

The order of the day having been called for by Mr. FISK, of New York, on the bill from the Senate, "authorizing payment to the widow of Elbridge Gerry, late Vice President of the United States, of such salary as would have been payable to him during the remainder of his term of service, had he so long lived,"

A motion was made, by Mr. EPPES, to postpone the further consideration thereof indefinitely.

This motion gave rise to a debate, in which Messrs. EPPES, CANNON, POTTER, TAYLOR, GROSVENOR, SHEFFEX, and PICKERING, advocated the postponement; and Messrs. FISK of New York, McKIM, FISK of Vermont, JACKSON of Virginia, HULBERT, WRIGHT, and OAKLEY, opposed it.

The debate was one of some interest. The general principle asserted by those opposed to the bill, was the impropriety of setting a precedent of pensions for civil services, which would entail on the United States the evils so grievously felt in despotic Governments, from the same source. The bill was advocated on the ground of respect for the services of the deceased patriot and public servant, whose family was by his decease placed in a state of absolute dependence.

The question on postponement was at length decided by yeas and nays—for postponement 86, against it 44, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alston, Anderson, Avery, Barnett, Brown, Caperton, Cannon, Champion, Cilley, Clendenin, Clopton, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Cooper, Crawford, Crouch, Culpeper, Davenport, Desha, Duval, Ely, Eppes, Franklin, Gaston, Geddes, Gholson, Glasgow, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Grosvenor, Hale, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Henderson, Humphreys, Hungerford, Irwin, Kennedy, Kilbourn, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Law, Leferts, Lewis, Lovett, Lyle, Macon, Markell, McLean, Montgomery, Moseley, Nelson, Ormsby, Pearson, Pickering, Piper, Pitkin, Potter, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Sage, Schureman, Seybert, Sheffield, Sherwood, Shipperd, Slaymaker, Stanford, Stockton, Strong, Sturges, Taggart, Tannehill, Taylor, Troup, Udree, Vose, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Williams, Winter, and Yancey.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Bard, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Bines, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Cox, Creighton, Farrow, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Gourdin, Hanson, Hasbrouck, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Hulbert, Ingersoll, Jackson of Rhode Island, Jackson of Virginia, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Kershaw, McKim, Moore, Murfree, Oakley, Parker, Pleasants, Ringgold, Roane, Robertson, Sevier, Smith of New York, Smith of Penn., Smith of Virginia, Stuart, Thompson, Wilson of Massachusetts, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wood, and Wright.

So the bill was indefinitely postponed—in other words, rejected.

The remainder of the sitting was occupied on Mr. KILBOURN's bill to provide, by encouraging actual settlement, for the protection of the Northwestern frontier; which was, in the end, indefinitely postponed.

TUESDAY, February 21.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "to amend the act, entitled 'An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same,'" and, "the act, entitled 'An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, and on gold and silver watches,'" were read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate disagree to the amendment of this House to the "resolution expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Jackson, and the troops under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the defence of New Orleans," except so much thereof as strikes out the word "immediate," in the third line of the first resolution.

The House proceeded to consider the said message: Whereupon, it was resolved, that this House insist on that part of their amendment to the resolutions aforesaid, to which the Senate have disagreed.

Ordered, That the Clerk do acquaint the Senate therewith.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes for the service of the year 1815," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House. They adhere to their disagreement to that part of the amendment of this House to the "resolutions expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Jackson and the troops under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the defence of New Orleans," to which they disagreed, and which have been insisted upon by this House.

The amendments to the bill "to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes for the service of the year 1815," were read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

entertained by Congress of the gallantry and good conduct, with which the reputation of the arms of the United States have been sustained during the late war by certain officers therein named—including many militia officers, and several field officers who have fallen in the service.) The resolutions were twice read, and referred to the same committee, to whom resolutions of a similar character, reported by that committee, have been referred.

The bill supplementary to the act for the better organization of the courts of the United States within the State of New York, was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate.

The bill from the Senate to increase the compensation of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, was twice read, and committed.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill declaratory of the powers of the Legislature of Illinois Territory, which, after the proposition of other amendments thereto, was ordered to lie on the table, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

The bill fixing the compensation, &c., of collectors of the direct tax and internal duties, was further debated and amended, and then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

DAY OF THANKSGIVING.

On motion of Mr. CULPEPER, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him a day or two ago, which is in the following words:

"It being a duty peculiarly incumbent in a time of public calamity and war, humbly and devoutly to acknowledge our dependence on Almighty God, and to implore his aid and protection; and, in times of deliverance and prosperity, to manifest our deep and undissembled gratitude to the Almighty Sovereign of the Universe:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a joint committee of both Houses wait upon the President of the United States, and request that he recommend a day of thanksgiving, to be observed by the people of the United States with religious solemnity and the offering of devout acknowledgments to God for his mercies, and in prayers to him for a continuance of his blessings."

On motion of Mr. RHEA, the resolution was amended in its preamble, by striking out the words in italic, and thus amended, the resolution was, after some conversation as to the preamble, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and, being accordingly subsequently read a third time, was ordered to be referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon.

BRITISH AND INDIAN DEPREDACTIONS.

Mr. LATTIMORE, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 21st ultimo, the memorial of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, relative to Indian depredations, made a report; which was read, as follows:

The memorialists state, that, in the eastern part of the above-mentioned Territory, great losses have been sustained from the wanton and unwarranted depredations of the Creeks; for which they conceive reparation is due to the sufferers out of the lands which have been ceded by the treaty lately concluded with that nation of Indians to the United States, and pray that a board of commissioners may be instituted for the purpose of ascertaining such losses, and with a view to such reparation.

Your committee have no doubt that the losses sustained by the inhabitants of this section of the country are great, and that their sufferings have been severe; but, conceiving that other cases may furnish claims to reparation, they are of opinion that any proceeding on the subject should not be partial in its object or effect. Abstaining from all remarks as to the important and extensive principle which this subject involves, your committee believe that it would be proper to ascertain, without unnecessary delay, all such losses, whether from English or Indian depredations, as may hereafter claim the attention of Congress, when the general question of indemnity may come before them; and in this view of the subject, and also with due regard to the particular case presented by the memorialists, they offer the following resolution to the consideration of the House:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to take such measures as may be convenient for the purpose of obtaining satisfactory evidence of all losses of property which have been sustained in consequence of the depredations of the British or Indians, or of the troops of the United States, during the late war; and that the memorial above considered be transmitted to him for his information on the subject to which it relates.

On the question of concurrence in said resolution, a desultory debate took place, which ended in laying the report on the table—the principal argument for this course being the propriety of so amending it as to limit it to depredations contrary to the laws and usages of war, which, it appeared to be admitted, ought to be a subject of amicable discussion and settlement between the two Governments.

WEDNESDAY, February 22.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills from this House with the following titles: "An act for the regulation of the courts of justice of Indiana;" and "An act giving the right of pre-emption in the purchase of lands to certain settlers in the Indiana Territory," with amendments. And they have passed bills of the following titles: "An act authorizing the discharge of Edward Martin from imprisonment;" "An act for the better temporary accommodation of the two Houses of Congress;" and "An act to repeal certain acts therein mentioned;" in which amendments and bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Thomas Sprigg; which passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Savage and others. The bill was reported to the House and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. McKEE, of Kentucky, reported a bill authorizing the sale of lands which may hereafter be forfeited within the Jefferson Land District at the land office for said district (merely declaring the place where such sales shall take place.) The bill was twice read, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The act to fix the compensation and increase the responsibility of the collectors of the direct tax, &c., and for other purposes connected therewith, was announced for a third reading. On motion of Mr. Fisk of New York, supported by Mr. JACKSON of Virginia, the bill was recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The order of the day on the bill from the Senate authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be built one or more floating batteries for the defence of the waters of the United States, was indefinitely postponed.

The bill authorizing the discharge of A. B. Ross from his imprisonment passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill supplementary to the act for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; as also did the bill for the relief of William T. Bennett, of the State of New York.

The bill for the relief of Solomon Frazer, and the representatives of Charles Eccleston, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill from the Senate, "concerning the field officers of the militia," was postponed indefinitely.

TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report recommending an agreement to the amendments of the Senate to the Treasury note bill.

The bill, as it went from this House, provided that those Treasury notes to be issued bearing no interest should be fundable at eight per cent., and those bearing interest at seven per cent. The Senate propose to amend the bill so as that the notes bearing no interest shall be fundable at seven per cent., and those bearing interest shall be fundable at six per cent.

Mr. E. said, that, as the state of war had ceased since the bill passed this House, and the state of peace would probably appreciate the value of the public securities, it was supposed the interest proposed by the Senate would be sufficient.

The amendments were agreed to.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States.

[The bill provides that the Military Peace Establishment shall consist of such proportions of artillery, infantry, and riflemen, not exceeding in the whole ten thousand men, as the President shall think proper; the corps of engineers to be retained. The general officers to consist of two Major Generals and four Brigadier Generals. The President to cause selections to be made of officers from the existing force, and to cause the supernumerary officers to be discharged as soon as circumstances shall permit. Three months pay to be given to each officer, &c., so honorably discharged, and, in addition, to each officer a donation of land; two thousand five hundred acres to a Major General, &c.; six hundred and forty to a Captain, four hundred and eighty to a subaltern. To each private, also, an additional donation of one hundred and sixty acres of land, provided the whole quantity of land such private receives shall not exceed three hundred and twenty acres. The bill also proposes to regulate the future organization of the Army.]

The bill was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

ESTIMATED REVENUE.

Mr. EPPES laid on the table the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 20, 1815.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated the 15th instant, which, in consequence of the termination of the war, requests, in behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means, "a view of the probable receipts from imports and tonnage during the year 1815, and any other information that may enable the committee to decide on the measures necessary to meet the unexpected and fortunate change which peace must produce in the resources of the United States." It has hitherto been my arduous and painful employment, to suggest to your consideration measures for relieving the embarrassments of the Treasury, with a view to the expenditures of a protracted war; and you will readily believe that, on every account, personal as well as public, I join you most sincerely in rejoicing at an event which brings with it an immediate alleviation of the pressure upon the Department, as well as a general assurance of national honor and prosperity.

The objects which claimed the attention of the committee in my former communication, were, 1st. The state of the public credit; 2d. The state of the circulating medium; and, 3d. The ways and means to defray the various expenses of the Government.

1. The public credit was depressed during the war, owing to several causes that must now cease to operate. All the circumstances, internal and external, which were calculated to excite doubt as to the duration, or as to the issue of the contest, in the minds of the cautious and the timid, have passed away, and, in their place, the proofs of confidence begin already to appear, with practical advantage. While it was doubtful to what extent the public exigencies would require the aid of loans, those persons who retained the means of lending either feared, or affected to fear, the eventual security of the Government; and even the exemplary display of the national resources, which has been made during the present session of Congress, for the benefit of the public creditors, was curtailed of its natural effect in the resuscitation of public credit, by the countervailing influence of causes which it is unnecessary to specify. But when the whole amount of the public debt incurred during the war is fixed and ascertained; when it is known that ample provision is made for the punctual payment of the interest, and for the gradual extinguishment of the principal of the debt; and when, above all, it is seen that Congress is inflexible in its adherence to the faith and policy of the Legislative pledges, the public credit of the United States will stand upon a basis the most durable and the most honorable.

2. The difficulties of the national circulating medium remain, however, to be encountered, under circumstances which the Government cannot control. The effects of the peace will certainly restore a metallic medium; but, until that result be produced, the only resource for all the pecuniary transactions of the Treasury, as well as of individuals, will be the issue of Treasury notes, and the notes of the State banks. If, indeed, the State banks were soon to resume their payments in specie; or if they were again to give credit and circulation to the notes of each other throughout the United States; and if they were, moreover, able and willing to accommodate the fiscal views of the Government, (which I do not permit myself for a moment to doubt,) a total dependence upon those institutions, however impolitic in the abstract, would be practically safe and beneficial. But if, on the other hand, the notes of the State banks shall continue limited, in circulation and use, to the city, the town, or the State, in which they are issued, it must be obvious that they cannot answer the purposes of a national medium; and that the receipt of such notes, in payments for duties of import, or national duties, will convert the public revenue, which is destined for general uses abroad as well as at home, into a local fund, that may not be wanted where it exists, and cannot be applied where it is wanted. It is, nevertheless, in the power of Congress to obviate, in a considerable degree, this difficulty, by authorizing the payment of a reasonable rate of exchange, upon the transfer of its revenue, from the places of collection and deposit to the places of demand and employment; and I respectfully recommend the expedient to the consideration of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The alternative, or concurrent resource of Treasury notes, for a national circulating medium, has, on other occasions, been considered. The security of the Government must always, upon every reasonable and candid estimate, be deemed superior to the security of any private corporation: and so far as Treasury notes bear an interest, and are receivable in the payment of duties and taxes, they are evidently more valuable than bank notes, which do not possess those characteristics. But the machinery of a bank is calculated to give an impulse and direction to its issues of paper which cannot be imparted by the forms of the Treasury, or any merely official institution, to the paper of the Government. In the operations of a bank, too, the facilities of bank credit supply the place, in a very important degree, of the issues of notes; so that a bank loan of thirty millions of dollars, for instance, would, probably, require no greater issue than six millions of dollars in notes. On the contrary, the whole amount of whatever sum is to be raised by an issue of Treasury notes, must be actually sent, in the form of Treasury notes, into the market, through the various channels of credit or demand. It is, however, to be admitted, that an issue of Treasury notes not greatly exceeding in amount the demand created for them by the duties and taxes, for which they are receivable, can be annually sustained;

but if the amount exceeds, or even equals, the amount of that demand, the revenue will generally be absorbed by the notes before it reaches the Treasury. The holder of the Treasury notes being thus paid in preference, and often to the exclusion of every other public creditor, and the other branches of the public service being thus deprived of the contemplated means for their support.

It is proper here to observe, that the actual issue of Treasury notes on this day, (including those due and unpaid, those which are daily becoming due, and those which have been ordered, but are not yet signed,) amounts to the sum of $18,637,436 80, and the amount will be constantly augmenting. If, therefore, the revenue for the year 1815, enriched by the duty on imports, and by the other beneficial effects of the peace, should amount to $20,000,000, it is still evident that the whole of the revenue might be expended in the single purpose of paying the Treasury note debt; leaving every other object of the Government to be provided for by loans, or by new issues of Treasury notes.

Having suggested the difficulty and the danger, I cannot presume to dwell upon any expedient for relief, which Congress has already refused to adopt; but I take the liberty, with deference and respect, to renew the recommendation of the plan that was submitted to your consideration in my letter of the 17th January last, under the belief that, considering the outstanding amount of Treasury notes, any new issue should be made to rest upon a basis that will enable the Government to employ it, both as a circulating medium, and as the means of raising money in aid of the revenue. How far a power, given to fund the Treasury notes upon an advanced interest, or to pass them in payment of taxes and duties, will be sufficient for the purposes contemplated, without providing other means of payment by regular instalments, I must submit to the judgment of the committee.

3. The ways and means to defray the various expenses of Government for 1815, will consist of the revenue which will be actually received at the Treasury during that year. It is not intended, on the one hand, to take into view the balances due upon the appropriations of preceding years; nor, on the other hand, to take into view the revenue which will accrue in the present year, but which will not be payable until the year 1816.

The direct amelioration of the resources of the country, in consequence of the peace, applies principally to the item of the duties on imports and tonnage. The effect, however, must be confined, with immaterial exceptions, for 1815, to two-thirds, or the eight concluding months of the year. The West India trade will produce little, and the European trade nothing, by way of revenue, before the first of May next. Some outstanding adventures beyond the Cape of Good Hope will hardly be brought home, upon the intelligence of peace, before the present year has expired. Considering, therefore, that a credit of eight, ten, and twelve months, is allowed for the duties on merchandise imported from Europe, and that a credit of three and six months is allowed for the duties on merchandise imported from the West Indies, it is evident, that whatever may be the amount accruing on merchandise imported from Europe for the year 1815, the actual receipts at the Treasury cannot be great; that the whole of the duties accruing on merchandise imported from the West Indies before the first of July, will be actually received at the Treasury in the year 1815; and that one moiety of the amount of the duties on merchandise imported from the West Indies, between the first of July and the first of October, will also be received at the Treasury in the year 1815.

Estimated Revenue.

The average of the net revenue of the customs which accrued for the three years, 1806, 1807, and 1808, was more than $14,000,000 for each year; and a similar average for the three succeeding years, 1809, 1810, and 1811, was about nine millions of dollars for each year. But the first period was one of uncommon commercial prosperity, when the United States were the only neutral nation, and cannot be taken as the basis of an estimate for the present time, when the other nations of the world are also at peace. The second period was embarrassed by commercial restrictions; but, probably, the effect of those embarrassments upon the revenue were counterbalanced by the advantages of our neutrality. It is thought, therefore, upon the whole, that, in a state of general peace, the customs, operating upon the single duties, would not have produced, before the American war, more than a sum between nine and ten millions of dollars annually. But the comparatively small quantity of foreign merchandise at present in the American market, would, probably, give rise to an extraordinary amount of importations during the first year of peace, equal at least to the supply of two years; if the fact, that the double duties are limited in their continuance to a year after the termination of the war, did not operate as a check upon importations, beyond what may be requisite for the consumption of the present year. These counteracting causes may, therefore, be reasonably supposed to neutralize the force of each other, and, consequently, to refer and confine any estimate of the double duties upon merchandise imported in the year 1815, to the amount of the importations for the consumption of a single year.

Under these views it is estimated that the produce of the customs, during the first twelve months of peace, will amount, with double duties, to a sum between eighteen and twenty millions of dollars. Of that period ten months occur in the year 1815; but as the importations can only partially commence for the space of two months, and cannot reach their average extent for three or four months, the fair proportion of time to form the ground of an estimate, will be (as already suggested) eight months of the year 1815. Upon this scale of computation the product of the customs, which will accrue from the 1st of May to the 31st of December, 1815, will probably be $13,500,000; but there must be added to that sum the estimated amount of customs accruing, independent of the effects produced by the peace, from the 1st of January to the 1st of May, to wit, $1,500,000; making the aggregate of the revenue of the customs, accruing in the year 1815, about $15,000,000.

It remains, however, to present an estimate of the amount of the customs which will not only accrue, but which will be actually received at the Treasury in the year 1815. The extent of the commerce, which is expected to be opened, and the effects of the credits which are allowed for the payment of duties for the year 1815, have been already explained. The estimate, therefore, assumes the following form:

1. The total revenue of the customs, accruing in the year 1815, being, as above stated - $15,000,000

It is estimated that, of that sum, there will become payable, and will actually be received into the Treasury, in the year 1815, in the manner exhibited in the annexed schedule marked A, about	3,500,000

2. That on account of custom-house bonds outstanding at the end of the year 1814, which, in the letter from this Department, dated the 17th of January, 1815, was reserved to meet the unsatisfied appropriations of that year, there will be received during the year 1815, near	3,000,000

Making the total amount of the actual receipts into the Treasury, from the customs, for the year 1815	$6,500,000
---	-------------

The ways and means of the Treasury for 1815, provided and payable during the year, may now be presented in a view essentially different from that which was necessarily taken in the letter from this Department, dated the 17th of January last, while contemplating a continuance of the war.

1. The duties on imports and tonnage will, probably, produce a sum, inclusive of that receivable for duties which accrued prior to the present year, of about	$6,500,000
2. The direct tax, instead of a sum of $2,000,000, will probably give to the Treasury, in the year 1815, in consequence of the facilities of the peace, a sum of about	2,500,000
3. The internal duties, old and new, and postage, instead of a sum of $7,050,000, will probably give to the Treasury, in the year 1815, in consequence of the facilities of the peace, a sum of about	8,000,000
4. The sales of the public lands will probably produce, in the year 1815	1,000,000
5. The amount of incidental receipts, from miscellaneous sources, will, probably, be about	200,000
	$18,200,000

While the revenue is thus materially augmented, the charges upon the Treasury will be considerably reduced. It is not in the power of this Department, at the present time, to advert to the estimates of the expenses of the peace establishment for the War and Navy Departments; but with the aid of the public credit, and the legislative sanction for the measures which will be proposed, it is believed that the Treasury will be competent, in that respect, to meet the most liberal views of the Government. Independent, therefore, of the estimates of the War and Navy Departments, the charges on the Treasury for the year 1815 will consist of the following items:

1. Civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous expenses, as stated in the general estimates for one thousand eight hundred and fifteen	$1,979,289 39
2. The public debt will call for a sum of $14,723,808 58, to answer the following claims:

For interest and reimbursement of the funded debt created before the war, (the amount of principal unredeemed on the 31st of December, 1814, being about 39,905,183 dollars 60 cents.) $3,452,775 46.

H. OF R.

Tax Bills—Defence of New Orleans.

FEBRUARY, 1815.

For interest of the funded debt created since the war, (the amount of principal on December 31, 1814, being $48,580,812 26, to which little has been since added,) about—
$3,000,000 00

For the principal and interest of Treasury notes falling due in 1815, and the first January, 1816, including $620,000 of notes issued under the act of February 25, 1813, falling due within this period	8,271,033 12	14,723,808 58
		$16,703,097 97

It is to be observed, however, that the preceding estimate does not include a sum of $2,799,200, being the principal of the Treasury notes which became due in 1814, and remain unpaid, because the unexecuted authority to raise money by loan for that year is sufficient to cover the amount, if a loan can be obtained, independent of the custom-house debt ($3,000,000) which accrued in 1814, but is payable in 1815, and which is now considered as part of the excess of $3,975,909 83, stated in the letter of the 17th of January, 1815, for the purpose of being specifically transferred, in the present estimates, from the ways and means of last year to the credit of the ways and means for the present year.

Upon the whole, then, it appears that the revenue for the year 1815 will probably amount to $18,200,000, and that ways and means are now to be devised to provide for the difference between that sum and the aggregate amount of the demands for the service of the year 1815; which will be ascertained by adding the amount of the estimates for the peace establishment of the War and Navy Departments to the amount of the demands for the expenses of Government and the public debt, being, as above stated, the sum of $16,703,097 97.

It only remains to suggest some additional measures, which appear to be required at this time for the support of the public credit, and the supply of the Treasury.

1. It is respectfully suggested that all the holders of the Treasury notes, issued or to be issued under the authority of any existing law, should be allowed to fund them at an interest of seven per cent.; and that interest be allowed on all Treasury notes which have not been punctually paid, until the day of funding, or of payment.

2. It is respectfully suggested that a new issue of Treasury notes should be authorized upon the principles suggested in the letter from this Department, dated the 17th of January, 1815.

3. It is respectfully suggested that a loan should be authorized to the amount necessary, upon a view of all the estimates, to complete the ways and means for the year 1815.

4. It is respectfully suggested, that the exportation of specie should be prohibited for a limited period.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

J. W. EPPES, Esq.,

TAX BILLS.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill amendatory of the direct tax and furniture tax bill, were before the House, and partly agreed and partly disagreed to. Among the amendments, was one repealing the section allowing annual assumption by the States of their respective quotas of the direct tax, and allowing a deduction of fifteen per cent. on the amount so assumed. The Committee of Ways and Means recommended a disagreement to this amendment.

This recommendation was supported by Messrs. EPPES, LOWNDES, FISK of Vermont, BARBOUR, JACKSON of Virginia, FARROW, MACON, and TAYLOR, and opposed by Messrs. PITKIN, and SHEFFEY.

In favor of the amendment, it was urged, by the latter gentlemen, that, although in time of war there might be good reasons for authorizing the anticipation of the revenue by allowing assumption of the direct tax by the States, yet, as a permanent tax, the direct tax and all other taxes ought to be collected by the United States' officers; and, besides, that the discount of fifteen per centum on such assumption was too great. Mr. SHEFFEY contended that this mode of laying direct tax was unconstitutional, inasmuch as the taxes ought to be laid on the people, and not on the States. Against the amendment was opposed the greater convenience to the people of allowing this mode of assumption, and the obvious advantages to the United States from that mode of collection, which, it was alleged, was also more economical than any other, inasmuch as it obviated the difficulties and delays unavoidably interposing in the way of the collection of the direct tax, and insured greater security to the revenue.

This amendment of the Senate was eventually disagreed to.

DEFENCE OF NEW ORLEANS.

An unfortunate disagreement having arisen between the two Houses as to the terms of the resolution bestowing thanks on General Jackson, a message was received from the Senate announcing its adherence to its disagreement to the amendments proposed by the House thereto. This left to the House the alternative only, it was believed, to adhere to or recede from its amendments.

Mr. TROUP proposed to adhere, in which course he was supported by Messrs. ROBERTSON, RHEA; and HUMPHREYS; on the other hand, Messrs. HAWKINS, WRIGHT, and MACON, were desirous of receding, if a conference could not be agreed on.

The point of difference is, that the House proposes to ascribe the merit of the great achievements on the banks of the Mississippi, principally to the militia volunteer force; whilst the Senate has given the merit generally to the regulars, volunteers, and militia, in language admitting the inference, it is contended, that our force was principally a regular force.

It was, therefore, argued, in favor of adherence, that the resolution of this House was a veritable history of the facts as they occurred, giving honor to those to whom honor was due, and that the resolution had better be lost altogether than to enter upon record a vote which would convey an erroneous impression, as it was contended the resolution of the Senate did. In favor of receding, it was argued, that history would narrate, in conspicuous characters, the facts as they exist, and that the light in which they would be viewed by posterity, would not depend on the terms of the vote of Congress on this occasion. The object of such a vote was not to afford materials for history, but to express the gratitude of the nation to its defenders. In the course of the debate, Mr. MACON took occasion to pass a very high eulogium on the character of Major General Jackson, whom he said he had long personally known, and he did not believe there existed a more honorable or highminded man.

In the end, the House determined, before a final decision, to request a conference with the Senate on the subject.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. KENT, of Maryland having called up the order of the day on the bill to incorporate the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown—

Mr. YANCEY proposed to postpone this order of the day indefinitely, under the impression that Congress would not act upon it at the present session.

The motion was opposed by Mr. JACKSON of Virginia, and Mr. KENT, but was decided in the affirmative.

The bill to incorporate the Bank of the Metropolis being called up by Mr. KENT of Maryland, the House refused to go into a Committee of the Whole on that bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR then moved to postpone the further consideration of the motion indefinitely.

Which motion was opposed by Mr. JOHNSON, and Mr. SHARP of Kentucky, and supported by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH of Maryland.

In support of the motion, it was alleged, generally, that all the applications of this character ought to share the same fate. Against it, it was argued that Washington had not been hitherto equally favored by Congress, it being notorious that there was greatly less incorporated bank capital in Washington than in either Georgetown or Alexandria.

The question on indefinite postponement was decided in the affirmative.

THURSDAY, February 23.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "giving the right of pre-emption in the purchase of lands to certain settlers in the Indiana Territory" were read, and concurred in by the House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "for the regulation of the courts of justice of Indiana," were read, and concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate, "authorizing the discharge of Edward Martin from imprisonment," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate, "for the better temporary accommodation of the two Houses of Congress," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate, "to repeal certain acts therein mentioned," was read twice, and ordered to be read a third time to-day.

Mr. ERRES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back to the House the bill to authorize the settlement and payment of certain claims for the services of the militia, sent from the Senate, without amendment; and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ERRES, under the direction of the same committee, moved,

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report at the next session a general tariff of duties proposed to be imposed upon imported goods, wares, and merchandise."

The motion was agreed to, ncm. con.

On motion of Mr. SEYBERT, the Committee on Naval Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the purchase of the vessels captured by Commodore Macdonough on Lake Champlain in the month of September last, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. SHERWOOD, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what alterations ought to be made in the laws relative to duties imposed on stills, employed solely in the rectification of spirituous liquors.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled "An act to authorize the President to raise certain companies of rangers for the defence of the frontiers of the United States, and to repeal certain acts now in force for this purpose," with amendments. They have passed bills of the following titles: "An act to repeal so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, as imposes a discriminating duty on tonnage between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, and between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels and vessels of the United States;" "An act further supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory,'" "An act to provide a library room, and for transporting the library lately purchased," and "An act to repeal certain acts concerning the flotilla service, and for other purposes;" in which amendments and bills they ask the concurrence of this House. They agree to the amendment to the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, and on gold and silver watches," and insist on their fifth amendment disagreed to by this House.

The bill from the Senate, "to repeal certain acts therein mentioned," was read the third time, and passed.

Two or three Messages were received from the President of the United States, one of which it appeared was of a confidential nature; and the doors were closed and galleries cleared, and, after so remaining for a short time, were again opened; when the following Message, being of a public nature, was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress copies of two ratified treaties which were entered into on the part of the United States, one on the 22d day of July, 1814, with the several tribes of Indians, called the Wyandotts, Delawares, Shawanees, Senacas, and Miamies; the other on the 9th day of August, 1814, with the Creek nation of Indians.

It is referred to the consideration of Congress, how far Legislative provisions may be necessary for carrying any part of those stipulations into effect.

JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 22, 1815.

The Message and treaties were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The engrossed bill, authorizing the sale of the public lands, which may hereafter be forfeited within the Jeffersonville district, to be exposed for sale at the land office within the same; the engrossed bill to authorize the discharge of A. B. Ross from his imprisonment; the engrossed bill for the relief of Thomas Spriggs; the engrossed bill for the relief of James Savage and others; the engrossed bill for the relief of Solomon Frazer, and the representatives of Charles Eccleston; the engrossed bill for the relief of William P. Bennet; and the engrossed bill supplementary to the act "for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri," were severally read a third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

MR. LATTIMORE, from the select committee on the memorial of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying admission into the Union, made a report favorable thereto, accompanied by a bill authorizing the people of the Territory of Mississippi to call a convention for the purpose of forming a Constitution and State Government preparatory to admission into the Union. The report was read, and, with the bill, on the motion of Mr. L., ordered to lie on the table.

The report is as follows:

By the articles of cession and agreement between the United States and the State of Georgia, it is provided that the Territory aforesaid shall form a State, and be admitted as such into the Union, as soon as it shall contain sixty thousand free inhabitants, or at an earlier period, if Congress shall think it expedient. Agreeably to the last general census, the population of this Territory, of all descriptions, amounted to forty thousand three hundred and fifty-two souls. Since this was taken, the amount has considerably increased by the annexation of that part of West Florida which lies east of Pearl river, and also, as your committee are informed, by emigrations to the eastern settlements of the Territory from several of the States.

Your committee are in possession of no data from which they can form an estimate of the number to which these accessions of population may amount; but they deem it not an unreasonable presumption that the return of peace, by renewing inducements to emigration, may produce an increase to the amount required by the agreement with Georgia, by the time the usual preparatory steps can be taken towards the actual admission of the Territory into the Union as a State. It would seem, therefore, as if what is now solicited would be obtained, of course, in a few years at most.

The question, then, is, is it expedient to provide for the adoption of this Territory into the Union as a favor, or was its admission of right?

The expediency of anticipating the admission of this community to the rights of an independent State involves in its consideration as well the particular interest of the Territory as the general interest of the United States. In relation to the former, it is to be presumed that the people themselves, who are best acquainted with their own local condition, can best judge of their ability to bear the additional expense of self-government, and weigh other consequences which may ensue from the change. As it respects the latter, your committee possess no facts which would add to the information, and can offer no reasons which would influence the opinion of the House on this point. Their mere opinion is all they have to submit; and it is, that there would be no impropriety in principle, and no injury in effect, to the interest of the nation, in providing, without further delay, for the admission of the Territory in question into the union of the States.

This Territory has been, as your committee believe, a longer time under the restraints of political minority than any other Territory of the United States; and they can perceive no good reason why its enlargement should still be deferred, merely on account of its present deficiency of numbers, since a like deficiency did not prevent others, or one other at least, from the enjoyment of a similar boon.

Hitherto your committee have considered this subject as though the admission solicited were desired by all the inhabitants of the Territory without delay, but they cannot undertake to state that such is the fact. While it is true, that it has been prayed for and urged with much interest and zeal at several successive sessions, it is also true that at the last one at which the subject was brought before Congress there were counter-petitions, praying that it might be postponed. How far a union of sentiment and wishes may be inferred from the absence of any counter-petition at the present session, when it was known that the memorial under consideration had been forwarded, your committee are not prepared to say. They can, however, judge and act from only what is before them; and it is to be presumed that the representatives of the people express the will of their constituents, unless the contrary appears. To which consideration it may be added, that the extinguishment of the Yazoo claims having removed what was perhaps the most general objection to admission, it is probable that many who were opposed to it are now in favor of it; and, since peace is restored, it is probable, also, that many others will desire to exchange the restrictions of a Territory for the rights of a State. If, however, from local considerations, other than those suggested, a difference of opinion in relation to the expediency of this object should still exist, your committee conceive that the question cannot be more fairly settled than by a convention, which should first decide whether it should form a constitution or not, and which might be chosen with a reference to the respective sentiments of the members on this particular point.

Believing it expedient, therefore, that the people of the Mississippi Territory should be authorized to elect a convention, with powers to form a constitution, as prayed for by the memorialists, your committee have prepared a bill for this purpose, which they ask leave to report.

MILITIA BOUNTY.

The following resolutions were submitted by Mr. EASTON:

1. Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to each non-commissioned officer and private of the militia of the Missouri Territory, who have performed a tour of duty by order of the Government of the United States, a donation in lands, as a compensation for their services.

2. Resolved, That the said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting donations of land to the frontier inhabitants of said Territory, who have been forced by the enemies of the United States to abandon their plantations or dwellings, and who have not abandoned or removed out of the said Territory.

The House proceeded to consider the said resolutions, and the same were amended to read as follows:

1. Resolved, That the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message, at the commencement of the session, which relates to the militia, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to each non-commissioned officer and private of the militia of the United States, and Territories thereof, who have performed a tour of duty by the order of the Government of the United States, a donation in lands, as a compensation for their services.

2. Resolved, That the said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting donations of lands to the frontier inhabitants of said States and Territories, who have been forced by the enemies of the United States to abandon their plantations and dwellings, and who have not abandoned or removed out of the said States or Territories.

And on the question to agree to the said resolutions, it was determined in the negative.

PAY OF MEMBERS.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for paying the members of this House in money current in the States to which they respectively belong.

This motion gave rise to some debate.

Mr. FISK grounded his motion on the discount the Eastern members were obliged to pay for Eastern notes, and the alleged impropriety of members of Congress travelling from shop to shop selling their wages, or bartering off the notes they receive in payment for such as shall be current in their States, &c.

Mr. RHEA moved to amend the resolution, by striking out the latter part of it, and inserting in lieu thereof, the words "Treasury notes or bank notes."

The object of the whole motion was supported by Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. FISK, and Mr. POTTER, and opposed by Mr. RHEA, Mr. NEWTON, Mr. FARROW, Mr. EPPES, Mr. INGHAM, Mr. MCKIM, and Mr. HAWKINS, who denied both its necessity and expediency.

A motion of Mr. EPPES, to lay the resolution on the table, was negatived.

Mr. HAWKINS moved an indefinite postponement of the whole subject, on the general and very obvious ground of the injustice of members of Congress discriminating between themselves and other public creditors, who have at least equally high claims on the Government.

Several unsuccessful motions were made to get rid of this question, by proceeding to the orders of the day, or laying it on the table. The question on indefinite postponement, was at length decided by yeas and nays—for the postponement 82, against it 50, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Bines, Bowen, Brown, Caperton, Calhoun, Cannon, Clopton, Comstock, Cox, Crawford, Creighton, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, Duvall, Eppes, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of New York, Forsyth, Franklin, Geddes, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gordin, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Hawkins, Humphreys, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Ingham, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Leferts, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Newton, Ormsby, Pearson, Piper, Pleasants, Rhea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ridgely, Ringgold, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Smith of Virginia, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Williams, and Yauncey.

NAYS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Butler, Champion, Cooper, Culpeper, Davenport, Ely, Fisk of Vermont, Gaston, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Hale, Hasbrouck, Henderson, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Hulbert, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Moseley, Nelson, Oakley, Parker, Pickering, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Ruggles, Schureman, Sherwood, Slaymaker, Smith of New York, Stanford, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Thompson, Vose, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Winter, Wood, and Wright.

So the resolve was indefinitely postponed.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill declaratory of the powers of the Legislature of the Territory of Illinois. And debate arising on the amendment proposed by Mr. McLEAN, on the 21st instant, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 24.

The House proceeded to reconsider their disagreement to the fifth amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill "to amend the act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same;" and the act "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a duty on household furniture, and on gold and silver watches." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House insist on their disagreement to the said fifth amendment, and ask a conference with the Senate upon the subject-matter thereof.

Ordered, That Messrs. EPPES, LOWNDES, and OAKLEY, be the managers at the said conference on the part of this House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "to authorize the President to raise certain companies of rangers for the defence of the frontiers of the United States, and to repeal certain acts now in force for that purpose," were read, and, together with the bill, ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate "further supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory,'" was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate, "to repeal so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, as imposes a discriminating duty on tonnage between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, and between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels and vessels of the United States," was read twice, and committed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The bill from the Senate, "to provide a library room, and for transporting the library lately purchased," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate, "to repeal certain acts concerning the flotilla service, and for other purposes," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. TROUP, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses in regard to the resolution of Congress expressive of their sense of General Jackson's great achievement, made a report, recommending a modification thereof, which was agreed to on the part of this House.

Mr. FISK, of New York, from the committee to whom was referred Mr. CULPEPER's motion for a thanksgiving day, reported the same with amendments; which having been agreed to, the resolution as amended was ordered to a third reading.

TAX COLLECTORS.

Mr. FISK, of New York, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was recommended the engrossed bill to fix the compensations and increase the responsibility of the collectors of the direct tax and internal duties, and for other purposes connected with the collection thereof, reported the same with amendments; which were read, and the first thereof was concurred in by the House.

The question was then taken to concur in the second amendment, which proposes to strike out the following words contained in the 8th section of the bill, to wit:

"And it shall further be the duty of the said collectors, by themselves, or their deputies, to attend at the court-house of each of the counties or districts composing their respective collection districts, on the first and second days of each term of the court of the county or common pleas in said county or district, if the court continue in session so long."

And passed in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Bigelow, Bines, Bowen, Boyd, Bradbury, Brown, Butler, Calhoun, Comstock, Conduct, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, Duvall, Ely, Eppes, Findley, Fisk of New York, Forsyth, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Hasbrouck, Hopkins of Kentucky, Humphreys, Ingersoll, Ingham, Jackson of Rhode Island, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Law, Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Moore, Moseley, Newton, Ormsby, Pickering, Piper, Pitkin, William Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Roane, Sage, Sharp, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Sturges, Taggart, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Wheaton, Williams, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Brigham, Caperton, Cannon, Champion, Clopton, Cooper, Culpeper, Farrow, Fisk of Vermont, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Hale, Harris, Hawes, Henderson, Hubbard, Hungerford, Hulbert, Irwin, Kennedy, Kent of New York, Kerr, King of Massachusetts, Lovett, Macon, Markell, Montgomery, Nelson, Pickens, Pleasants, Ruggles, Schureman, Sevier, Sherwood, Shipherd, Slaymaker, Stanford, Stockton, Stuart, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Yancey.

Ordered, That the said bill be re-engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

RELATIONS WITH ALGIERS.

The following report, yesterday transmitted to the House by the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, was read:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 20, 1815.

The acting Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th instant, requesting the President of the United States to cause to be laid before that House such information as he shall deem necessary to be communicated, touching the state of relations existing between the United States and the Barbary Powers, has the honor to state, that, according to the latest accounts from Morocco, Tunis, and Tripoli, our relations with those Powers remained upon their former footing; nor is there any particular reason to believe that any change has since taken place.

It will appear, by the documents accompanying the Message of the President to Congress on the 17th November, 1812, that the Dey of Algiers had, violently and without just cause, obliged the Consul of the United States, and all American citizens then in Algiers, to leave that place in a manner highly offensive to their country and injurious to themselves, and in violation of the treaty then subsisting between the two nations. It appears, moreover, that he exacted from the Consul, under pain of immediate imprisonment, a large sum of money, to which he had no claim but what originated in his own injustice.

These acts of violence and outrage have been followed by the capture of at least one American vessel, and by the seizure of an American citizen on board a neutral vessel. The unfortunate persons thus captured, are yet held in captivity, with the exception of two of them, who have been ransomed. Every effort to obtain the release of the others has proved abortive; and there is some reason to believe that they are held by the Dey as a means by which he calculates to extort from the United States a degrading treaty.

JAMES MONROE.

The galleries were then cleared, and the doors of the House closed, and so remained until near five o'clock, when the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 25.

Mr. EPPEL, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to authorize a loan for a sum not exceeding — dollars; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EPPEL also reported a bill to prohibit the exportation of specie, gold or silver coins, or bullion; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas B. Farish; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. YANCEY, the Committee of Claims were discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William Thornton, and it was referred to the Secretary of State.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill authorizing the purchase of the vessels captured on Lake Champlain; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLEASANTS, also from the Naval Committee, to whom was referred the bill for repealing certain acts relative to the flotilla service, reported an amendment thereto, the object of which was to authorize the President to cause to be sold such of the gunboats now in service as he shall deem it unnecessary to retain. And this amendment being agreed to, the bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was accordingly subsequently read a third time, passed, and the concurrence of the Senate desired in the amendment.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON,

Ordered, That the digest of the manufactures of the United States, made in pursuance of an order of this House, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be distributed amongst the members of the House of Representatives and of the Senate of the United States, and Executive authorities of the States and Territories.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill from this House, entitled "An act to amend and extend the provisions of the act of the 16th of April, 1814, entitled 'An act confirming certain claims to land in the Illinois Territory, and providing for their location,' with amendments. The amendments were read, and concurred in by the House.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill declaratory of the powers of the Legislature of the Territory of Illinois; and the amendment proposed by Mr. McLEAN, on the 21st instant, was concurred in by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time on Monday next.

An engrossed bill to fix the compensations and increase the responsibility of the collectors of the direct tax and internal duties, and for other purposes, connected with the collection thereof, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to wait upon the President and request that he recommend a day of thanksgiving to Almighty God for his goodness in restoring to these United States the blessings of peace, was read the third time and passed.

The bill from the Senate, "to repeal certain acts concerning the flotilla service, and for other purposes," was read the third time, as amended, and passed.

A Message was received from the President of the United States recommending the navigation of American vessels exclusively by American seamen, either natives, or such as are already naturalized.—Referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FISK, of New York, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency, of providing by law, for the meeting of the next Congress.

Mr. F. said, he was not prepared to say that it was necessary to pass such a law; but he was prepared to say that the state of the nation was such as to make it expedient to inquire into the subject, and ascertain whether an extra session might not be necessary, or, if not, at an earlier session than will take place otherwise.

The resolution was agreed to.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate unanimously agree to the amendment to the resolution "expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Jackson, and the troops under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the defence of New Orleans," modified agreeably to the report of the committee of conference. They agree to the conference upon the disagreeing vote of the two Houses upon the subject-matter of the fifth amendment to the bill "to amend the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenue for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same," and the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture and on gold and silver watches;"

to which conference they have appointed managers on their part. They have passed the bill from the House, entitled "An act to alter and establish post roads," with amendments. And they have passed bills of the following titles: "An act making further provision for completing the public buildings at West Point, for the accommodation of the Military Academy;" and "An act to continue in force, for a limited time, the act, entitled 'An act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes,'" in which amendments and bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

PROTECTION TO MANUFACTURES.

Mr. SEYBERT presented a petition of sundry manufacturers residing in the city and county of Philadelphia, and State of Pennsylvania, praying for the adoption of such measures as will afford to the manufacturers of the country that protection and support necessary to bring them to maturity.—The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress met, the memorial of the manufacturers of the city and county of Philadelphia respectfully sheweth:

That your memorialists, while filled with joy and exultation for the inestimable blessing of honorable peace to their country, cannot divest themselves of anxiety and dread for the fate of the infant manufactures, whose existence and prosperity are unquestionably of vital importance to the whole community. That, trusting to Providence, to the wisdom and protection of your honorable body, and to their own industry, they look forward, with hope, to the permanent establishment of such manufactures as shall render the United States independent on foreign nations for the necessities and comforts of life.

That, confiding implicitly in the wisdom and patriotism of your honorable body, your memorialists will not presume to suggest any particular measure, but will content themselves with observing, that every civilized nation has thought proper, by legislative acts, to afford to the industry of their respective countries that protection and support necessary to bring forth to maturity the establishment of manufactures necessary to their existence and prosperity. The intimate connexion of the agricultural with the manufacturing interest, and the extreme importance of a competent supply, in times of war, for the Army and Navy of the United States, without dependence on foreign aid, will be so obvious to your honorable body as to require no comment on the part of your memorialists.

But your memorialists respectfully beg leave to call the attention of your honorable body to the existence and correction of an abuse, which is, at the same time, destructive of the revenues of the United States, highly injurious to the honest merchant, and, if persisted in, will render entirely useless any law enacting protecting duties. This abuse is the introduction, through the custom-houses of our country, of merchandise subject to ad valorem duties, at from one-fourth to one-half of their value. This enormity, practised in various shapes, cannot be checked by any provision of the present revenue laws, and it is to the wisdom of your honorable body, alone, that your memorialists and the country can look for a competent remedy. This remedy may probably be found in the substitution of specific for ad valorem duties, or in the establishment of a board, at each custom-house, possessing the requisite power; which board might be composed of the collector and naval officer, and one respectable competent individual capable of deciding on the value of merchandise imported. The extraordinary expense to be borne by the merchandise imported.

Your memorialists respectfully add, that, in making the above suggestion, they resign themselves, with perfect confidence, to the better judgment of your honorable body. And for the welfare of your honorable body your memorialists will ever sincerely pray.

THOMAS GILPIN, and others.

The memorial was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

PROTESTED BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Mr. HAWKINS moved the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of refunding to individuals the amount of damages, or loss of interest sustained in consequence of the protest of any bills of exchange, drawn on the Government by any individuals, within the last twelve months.

In reply to an inquiry by Mr. McKIM, for facts on which this motion was predicated—

Mr. HAWKINS stated, that there had been a few instances in which individuals had procured bills of exchange on the Government, and, in consequence of inability to pay them, had been compelled to pay damages thereon. There was only one case within his own knowledge, and that was one in which an individual had paid for a draft on the Government $14,000, which draft had been sold by him to the Bank of Kentucky, by it to the Bank of Pennsylvania, by whom, through the Bank of Washington, it had been presented to the Government, protested for want of funds, and returned. The laws of Kentucky authorizing ten per cent. damages on protested bills, paid over to third persons, that allowance had been claimed by the banks, and the individuals compelled to pay it. The bill had since been presented by him (Mr. HAWKINS) to the Treasury, and paid in Treasury notes, on which the person before named was compelled to pay six and a half per cent. discount.

Mr. FARROW opposed the motion at some length, and moved to amend it by adding to the end thereof, the following words: "And also Treasury notes which have been paid by the Government to fair creditors, and necessarily sold by said creditors at a discount."

This amendment, after some conversation, having been agreed to by a small majority—

On motion of Mr. HAWKINS, the motion as amended was ordered to lie on the table.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill for fixing the Military Peace Establishment; and the first section of the bill having been read, which proposes to fix it at ten thousand men—

Mr. TROUP said the Military Establishment had just been perfected—the Army had just been made one of the finest in the world, when it became necessary to reduce it. It was the less to be regretted, however, as the cause of it was a subject of sincere and universal congratulation—it was proper to reduce the Army. The only questions for the House were, 1st. The extent of the reduction. 2dly. The mode of reduction.

With respect to the first, (the extent of reduction) he presumed that three objects ought to claim the attention of the House. 1st. The security of the country; 2dly. The interest of the country; and 3dly. The just claims of the Army.

In considering the security of the country, it was only necessary to advert to the actual state of the country. The war had this moment terminated and left us surrounded with the fleets and armies—the formidable fleets and armies of our late enemy. What security had we that those fleets and armies would be withdrawn? At least we had no other security than the good faith of the nation with whom we had concluded the peace. Admitting that faith to be what it ought to be, he submitted with much deference to the House, whether the security of any country ought to be made to depend upon the good faith of any other country. He presumed that a respectable military force would be a much safer dependence. So said the policy and practice of all civilized nations—so said the policy and practice of all the nations of Europe. There the practice was to disband or withdraw pari passu—the one Power withdrawing as the other withdrew—the one Power reducing as the other reduced. He did not know an instance in European history of two nations terminating a war by an honorable peace, where the one instantaneously reduced its military force to a Peace Establishment, leaving the other to maintain its force on a War Establishment upon its frontier. Such, however, would be precisely our case if we determined on a sudden and great reduction of the army.

The treaty of peace had stipulated the surrender of posts and the restoration of certain property—both were important, and yet what security had we that either stipulation would be fulfilled if we suddenly stripped ourselves of our military power? We would have no reliance left but on the good faith of our late enemy. If the posts were not surrendered or the property restored, he presumed we would begin to reorganize and restore our Army; he thought it therefore more wise and more prudent, on the ground of security, to make our reduction moderate, limited, and gradual.

But, 2dly. The interest of the country. The interest of the country, in one sense of the word, required not merely the reduction but the annihilation of the Army. It was the interest of the country to relieve the Government and country from the burden of the whole military expense; but this could only be done by the entire destruction of the military force. Why, therefore, was it not proposed to put down the Army altogether? Only because the security of the country forbade it. Here, then, was a consideration of interest connected with the consideration of security. But there was an interest distinct and independent; it was that which would look with a steady eye to what were considered great and important rights and principles, not settled by the treaty of peace. The treaty of peace was a treaty of peace merely—it was properly such—it proposed little more than to put an end to the war. Much more remained to be settled; rights, principles and interests, considered essential to the prosperity of commerce, navigation and fisheries, remained to be settled. This was to be done in the only way in which it ought to be done—by a treaty of commerce. Nations negotiate with more weight and influence with arms in their hands than without them, and a large army would carry into a negotiation more weight and influence than a small one; he submitted therefore to the House, whether a great and sudden reduction of the Army would not prejudice those rights and interests, and whether the interest of the United States did not, on this account, require for the present the exhibition of a respectable military force.

But, 3dly. The just claims of the Army. Whether the reduction were great or small, instantaneous or eventual, the just claims of the Army could not fail to be a subject of consideration with the House. By the just claims of the Army he did not mean to be understood as speaking of absolute right on the one side and correspondent absolute obligation on the other; all he meant was, a just and equitable claim to liberal provision from the generosity of the Legislature. The officers and soldiers to be disbanded were entitled to a liberal provision, not because they had embarked in the regular service—not because they had exposed their lives in defence of their country—not because very many of them had been wounded and disabled—not because very many of them had fallen, leaving their wives and children dependent on the charities of the world—not because these brave men were still willing further to expose their lives—not because their skill and valor had greatly contributed to the restoration of the blessings of peace—not for all these—but because they had entered into the service for years, perhaps forever; abandoning the pursuits of civil life by which they subsisted and betaking themselves to arms as a profession. This profession was not by their own act, but by the act of Government suddenly and unexpectedly taken from them, and they were turned upon the world without occupation, many of them penniless and in debt. It was right, it was just, that a provision should be made which would enable them to subsist until they could find employment, it was the more so in a country where there was no pension list, no hotel of invalids; it was on this principle that all Governments had made liberal and generous provision for disbanded officers; it was on this principle that the Old Congress had made provision for the disbanded officers of the Revolution. The provision proposed was far from a liberal provision, but it was better than nothing; it was a provision in land and not in money; because it was believed to be more convenient to the Government to give land than money. He hoped that the House would never think of disbanding the Army without making some provision.

Secondly. The mode of reduction. There were three modes of reducing the Army; the first was, by retaining in service all the regiments, reducing both officers and men—the skeletons of regiments being preserved, it would only be necessary on any emergency compelling a resort to arms, to fill up and supply; the second mode was, by reducing the number of regiments one-half or one-third, and reducing at the same time both officers and men of each regiment, but so reducing the officers as to retain a sufficient number of field, and company, and staff officers to enable the Government on the recurrence of war to double the number of regiments, giving to each regiment an experienced officer of the various grades; the third mode was, the consolidation and reduction proposed by the bill, the effect of which was, to reduce the Army to the old Peace Establishment. It was hoped that the House would consider the reduction to ten thousand as the lowest possible reduction; it would reduce the expense of the Military Establishment to a mere trifle compared with the war expenditure. He would give the estimate, which would show that the annual expense would be less than three millions:

10,000 men, at $200 each	-	-	$2,000,000
2 major generals and aids	-	-	12,900
4 brigadier generals and aids	-	-	14,500
8 colonels	-	-	13,000
14 lieutenant colonels	-	-	20,000
128 captains	-	-	84,000
128 first lieutenants	-	-	78,000
128 second lieutenants	-	-	70,000
48 third lieutenants (artillery,)	-	-	23,600
128 ensigns	-	-	60,764
			<hr/>
			2,376,764
Staff	-	-	100,000
Camp equipage	-	-	60,000
Medicine and hospital stores	-	-	30,000
Quartermaster's stores, fuel, stationery, straw, and transportation	-	-	100,000
			$2,666,764

Making an aggregate expense of two millions six hundred thousand dollars. The actual expenditure would, he was convinced, fall short of the estimate; the war cost of a soldier, completely equipped and furnished, was three hundred and eight dollars per annum; the peace cost was only one hundred and ninety dollars per annum, but he had set it down at two hundred dollars per man; besides, the estimate supposed that the corps would always be full, which would seldom or never happen, and the quantity of camp equipage, hospital stores, and quartermaster's stores on hand, would, for the first year or two, make a considerable deduction from those items. With these observations he would submit the subject for the decision of the House.

Mr. PICKERING said, he should be glad to know how this force was to be disposed of; where it was to be stationed, and how employed. He should be glad to hear the reasons why so large a number of men were to be employed, as, he said, the reasons in favor of so large a force had not been such as to satisfy him. If any detailed statement on these points were afforded, he said, the House would be better able to judge of the propriety of the course proposed.

Mr. TROUP said, the committee had no such detailed statement; but, there could be no doubt the troops would be stationed at the various posts and garrisons in the United States, and wherever their services would appear to be best applied.

Mr. DESHA said, duty impelled him to make a motion to try the sense of the Committee, as to the number of the Army necessary to be kept up for a Peace Establishment. Although he had always been in favor of the greatest number proposed in time of war, because he thought it prudent to relieve the militia from being harassed by draughts, yet he was not in favor of a large Peace Establishment. He therefore moved to strike out the word ten and insert six. He believed six thousand to be sufficient for all purposes in time of peace; we have no use for a regular army in time of peace, but for the purpose of keeping up the frontier garrisons, and to take care of the arms, &c.—then how many garrisons will it be necessary to keep up? not exceeding twenty-five or thirty. Indeed he believed thirty to be the extent of the number we have, and will not one hundred be sufficient, on an average, to each garrison? He said some would require perhaps more than a hundred, but others would not require more than twenty-five or thirty men—then supposing the average to be one hundred and the number of garrisons thirty, which will be the extent, you will require but three thousand for garrison purpose; then, admitting the amendment succeeds, you will have three thousand to go on, supposing the number always to be complete, but which is not to be presumed. Then where is the necessity of keeping up ten thousand? Gentlemen tell you it is necessary as a security against imposition from foreign Powers. Mr. D. said we have a better security than ten, or even fifty, thousand regulars. The yeomanry of the country is the great security; and circumstances have proven in this war that the militia and volunteers of the country, when well officered and managed, are able for the best veteran troops of Britain, which is, I confess, a subject of pride, because it proves that there is no necessity of keeping up a large standing army in time of peace. He said the people had suffered privations of every description since the declaration of war, and would have borne as much more if it had been necessary. They have acted generally worthy of freemen. But if all the taxes are to be rivetted on them for the purpose of keeping up large standing armies in time of peace, what have they gained by their patriotic exertions? Very little but the satisfaction of having decently drubbed the enemy in many instances. We have gotten through the war—peace is concluded—the first consideration in my estimation is to curtail our expenses, and by which ameliorate the condition of the people. It is proven that the militia of the country are capable at all times at least of defensive operations, consequently will not be willing to pay heavy taxes, for the purpose of keeping large standing armies. We have boasted that a well organized militia was the bulwark of our liberty, and recent circumstances have proved it to be a fact; then where is the necessity of going into a measure that is inconsistent with the nature of our Government? But it is said that ten thousand regular forces are necessary to keep the hostile Indians of the West in check. Mr. D. said regulars were not the kind of force the best adapted to Indian warfare; the Western riflemen were the best calculated to chastise the insolence of the Indians. There will be no difficulty, if it becomes necessary, to obtain a sufficiency of volunteer riflemen from the West to keep the Indians in check. They are the kind of force that the Indians are afraid of; they care very little for your regular musketry. But it is said to be imprudent to reduce the regular Army much till the British give up our garrisons. Sir, we have possession of, and have garrisons on their territory; we have also possession of two of the lakes. It is presumed that the garrisons on each side will be given up simultaneously. He said he believed there was no danger but they would give up the garrisons and be glad to be off so. They will not run the risk of having their veteran troops again chastised by the militia. Mr. D. said, the best security was, that the enemy know that we have nearly a million of militia, composed of the yeomanry of the country, who are willing at all times to protect their rights as becomes freemen.

Mr. WRIGHT said he hoped that the motion of his friend from Kentucky would not obtain. To reduce the Army at this time to six thousand, said he, appears to me to be premature, while the forces of Great Britain are yet in our neighborhood, and hovering on our coast. I think it should not be reduced to less than ten thousand, the number reported by the committee, and indeed, sir, a larger number would meet my approbation. It will be recollected, that there are several executory articles, the delivery of posts, &c., and in this posture of our affairs we ought to move with caution. The Kings and Emperors of Europe, it will be recollected, are now at Vienna distributing the spoils of their confederation, the petty dominions of the Continent, and may not do it so as to effect a general peace. They too have yet large armies. We ought not to forget the Treaty of Amiens, and the immediate breach of it, although I have little doubt of the sincerity of Great Britain in the peace, and hope it may be permanent. But, had she been insincere at the time, I am confident that the disaster her troops have sustained at New Orleans would be a perfect panacea of her war spirit against the United States. I hope my friend will withdraw his motion, upon its being considered that ten thousand men was the Peace Establishment in 1808, and then met the approbation of Congress, and that the Administration at this time have advised a much larger number. The Indians may not feel disposed to be at peace with us, although I have the strongest grounds to hope they will, as I have always believed that they were pressed into the war by the British, and that, as they were now at peace with us, they would cease their excitements of the Indians to hostility against us, and that the effect will cease with the cause.

Mr. DESHA declined withdrawing his motion.

Mr. SHARP said, he should have been gratified had the Military Committee given the House some statement of what number of troops would be necessary to keep up the garrisons at the different posts. He should like to know the number estimated by the Executive, as necessary for that purpose. If ten thousand men were necessary for that purpose, he would vote them; but he was unwilling to vote a single man for any other purpose. For the purposes of war a standing army of ten thousand men was nothing—for a Peace Establishment, five thousand were enough. The way to support the military character, and to propagate and preserve military science, he conceived, was by a liberal establishment of military schools, &c. Education makes soldiers. Our old army, the officers of which had generally been so long in service, had, he said, made no considerable figure during the late war; its officers had been generally eclipsed by those of later appointment. The officers of a Peace Establishment were by their habits fitted to command on garrison duty, but were frequently mere drones; it was in times of exigency, that talents and intrepidity were called to the standard of their country, and not in time of peace, when there was so little in the military life attractive to a man of spirit and enterprise. Mr. S. said, unless it should be proved to him, that ten thousand men were necessary for garrison duty, he should vote in favor of five thousand, which he believed to be sufficient. In time of peace, he believed no gentleman would employ our soldiers in opening roads, or making canals, as the Romans did theirs; they could therefore perform no labor or service, unless it was in building forts, repairing garrisons, or mere military parade. As to what might be the disposition of our late enemy, five, ten or fifteen thousand men more or less would not put us in a better situation to enforce our rights in the negotiation of a treaty of commerce, than we are now in. A decided course on the part of those who administer the Government, a proper use of their resources of men and money, would put them in a very short time in a condition to wage war, if it ever again became necessary, and would secure them the respect of those Powers disposed to invade our rights. Meanwhile, as things now stand, we ought to curtail our expenses, and husband our resources. This is a Government of the people, and, to carry them with you, the burdens you impose on them should be made as light as possible. Mr. S. said he felt as much as any one the value of the services rendered by our army; he admired as much as any one the brilliant achievements by the talents of our officers and the bravery of the soldiers. That character had been principally acquired since the commencement of the war, and was not to be supported by the extent of the Peace Establishment beyond its necessary force, but rather by the establishment of proper military academical institutions throughout the country, &c.

Mr. TROUP stated that the Military Committee had received from the War Department, yesterday, a communication, which, in its material parts, was a confidential communication, and improper to be exposed to the world at large, though it might without impropriety be read by every member of the House; and, if the House thought it of sufficient importance to go into secret session on the subject, they might do so, and it could be read. The communication, he said, expressed in as decided terms as could be used, the opinion that a certain amount of military force ought to be retained. Mr. T. then quoted a part of the Message recommending the retention of twenty thousand men on the Military Establishment.

Mr. PORTER said he hoped the motion now pending to reduce the Army to six thousand would prevail, and wished that the gentleman had moved to reduce the Army to two thousand men. Ten thousand men, he said, were nothing for the purposes of war, but quite enough to garrison the posts on the seaboard during a time of peace. We did not want more for the latter object in peace than it seemed we had wanted in war; and, as regarded the State he represented, he wanted none of them. As to the points to be settled by a treaty of commerce, to-day was the first time he had ever heard it was necessary to keep up an army, to induce a nation to make a good bargain with you. We stand on equal ground in relation to a commercial treaty; and if Great Britain should not see fit to make one, he would not agree to fight her for it. If the objects for which we went to war are not attained, and, instead of settling them in a treaty of peace, they are reserved to quarrel about in a treaty of commerce, we have gone to war for nothing, and made peace in vain. He hoped and believed it was the mutual interest of the two nations to be at peace, and to have a good commercial treaty. It had been said that twenty thousand men would cost less than six millions. We have, Mr. P. said, talked so long about millions and millions, that we have almost lost all idea of the value of money. But, if the people, who are taxed to pay these six millions, were told it was only for the purpose of supporting a little standing army, they would think it a matter of some consequence. It was of more importance, Mr. P. said, to reduce the burdens on the people than to keep up a small army for the purpose of continuing the present taxation on the people. This nation would have more influence with the British or any other nation, if it had plenty of money, without an army, than it would have if it were pressed for money and had a standing army. We had derived some experience from the war just closed, which had been begun without money and without men. The re-establishment of the credit of the nation would be of much more importance to the nation should it again be involved in war, than the support of a standing army in the interval of peace.

To keep up an army of ten thousand men would, he said, be an useless and unnecessary expense.

The question on reducing the number from ten to six thousand, was then taken and decided in the affirmative.

One section of the bill, provides that "from and after the first day of April next, or as soon thereafter as circumstances may permit," this act shall take effect, and the supernumerary officers and men be discharged.

A motion was made to substitute for the above quoted words, the words "as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made."

Mr. LOWNDES opposed the motion. He suggested that it would be extremely imprudent to direct that as soon as the mere mechanical arrangements could be made, the whole army should be disbanded. It would be the first time, he believed, any such arrangement had been made by a nation on the instant of a conclusion of a peace. Suppose any difficulty should occur in the evacuation of the posts held by the late enemy on our territory—there is no man who would not say a discretion to retain the army in being in such a case ought not to be left with the Executive. He would not wish the Government so imperiously bound by law, that, no matter what unexpected emergency might arise, it would be compelled to drop this force from its hands. He therefore thought there was an obvious impropriety in the proposed amendment.

The motion above stated was then withdrawn by the mover.

Mr. PICKERING said, if this discretion was left in the bill, its provisions would be nearly nugatory. When will circumstances admit of disbanding the Army, according to the ideas of the gentleman from South Carolina? Something had been said of the unsettled state of Europe. But, suppose war to arise in Europe—shall we not thereby be more than ever secured against war on our shores? Surely no gentleman in the House could believe there was any danger of a renewal of the war we had just terminated; and, if not, why not reduce the Army so soon as arrangements for that purpose can be made? If the latitude proposed be left, then the whole army may be retained in service for six months longer, or even until the next session of Congress. Why should the nation, burdened as it is with taxes, groaning under the weight of taxes necessary to pay the war debt, be still further burdened by unnecessarily keeping this force in service?

Mr. P. BARBOUR said, as a member of the Military Committee, he had accorded in opinion with the report. All things considered, he had preferred the number of ten thousand men for the Peace Establishment. That number had been to-day reduced by the House. Mr. B. said he was as desirous as any one could be to curtail the expenses of the nation; and if he believed one thousand men sufficient for the Peace Establishment, he would vote to reduce it to that number; but in the present state of things, and in the actual situation of the country, the suggestion of the gentleman from South Carolina was entitled to much weight. To leave a discretion with the Executive, may do the nation much good, and cannot do it much harm. Have we, said Mr. B., confidence in the Executive that he will do his duty; that he will, if the discretion be confided to him, do what is right? I have no hesitation in saying, he will. How then will the case stand? On this obvious and correct ground: If the circumstances of the country warrant the disbandment, it will take place. If not, the reduction will not and ought not to take place. With regard to the European conflict, that, Mr. B. apprehended, the Executive would not take into the inquiry as to the expediency of disbanding the Army; but, there were, by the treaty, posts mutually to be restored. There was an army of the British Government now in Canada from twenty-five to thirty or thirty-five thousand strong, which he hoped would be withdrawn from our lines, as well as the blockading squadrons from our coast. He hoped that all the articles of the treaty would be faithfully executed on the part of the British Government, as he knew they would be on the part of the American. But we have had experience on the conclusion of the former war, which teaches us that these expectations may be disappointed. We know that the posts on the frontier were not delivered up, and other articles were not complied with of a treaty entered into with as much solemnity as this; that, from 1783 to 1794, one of our posts was not delivered up. Mr. B. said, he was anxious to pare down the expenses of the Government to the least possible sum, compatible with the interest and security of the Government; but, in the present situation of the country, peace having terminated with a nation with whom we once before made a treaty, portions of which treaty (about which there could be no difficulty of construction) had not been complied with for from four to eleven years, there could not be any possible objection to vesting a discretionary power in the Executive in regard to a disbandment of the Army. On this simple proposition, truth and propriety were stamped on its face; if the situation of the country justifies disbandment, it will take place; if it does not, the Army will not, because it ought not to be disbanded.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, having moved to amend the clause above stated, by striking out the words "from and after the first day of April"—

Mr. EPES said, he was certainly as much disposed as any other man to repose confidence in the present Executive; but he was unwilling to repose in any Executive a power to decide absolutely so important a question as that of the disbandment of an army. As the bill was reported, a fair limit was given to the discretion of the Executive, by enacting that, as soon as practicable after a given day, the Army should be disbanded: but, were the amendment adopted, it would be left to the discretion of the Executive, whether the Army should be disbanded at all. Mr. E. said, it was that to which he objected. If the arguments of his colleague (Mr. BARBOUR) were correct, we ought to keep up the Army for another year, because, before the late enemy gives up the territory in his possession, the boundary lines must be ascertained and run by commissioners. Mr. E. said, he was opposed to committing the reduction of the Army entirely to the Executive, for very obvious reasons; because the House already knew what was the opinion of the Executive. A part of a paper had been read from that department of the Government, expressing the opinion that we ought to keep up the skeleton of an army, consisting of twenty thousand men. Can the Executive then, consistently with the opinion that we ought to retain a force of twenty thousand men, reduce the Army to six thousand, if the matter be, as proposed, entirely submitted to his discretion? If the amendment does not prevail, the President will be compelled, on the first day of April next, unless some new circumstance occurs, to disband all the Army except six thousand men. Whilst upon this subject, Mr. E. said, he would state to the Committee that he believed it of great importance that the Military Establishment should be confined within narrow limits. Whilst the war continued, he was as willing as any member to make every exertion to support the contest in which we were engaged. But the war having now terminated, gloriously as he thought to the American character, we ought at once to reduce our expenses as low as possible, consistently with the public interest, and to prepare to relieve the people from the burdens imposed upon them. If, during the present session, Congress did not reduce the Military Establishment within reasonable limits, the people would in vain look for a reduction or repeal of the taxes in the next year. Nothing but an immediate reduction of the Army could insure that object. Every dollar for the support of the Military Naval Establishment, must, during the present year, be borrowed. To show the correctness of this position, Mr. E. made the following statement:

Receipts into the Treasury for the year 1815.

Military Peace Establishment.

FEBRUARY, 1815.

Which, taken from $18,200,000, the amount of the receipts, will leave the sum of $1,496,902, being the surplus of the revenue after paying the civil list, the debt, and Treasury notes due in 1815 and 1816—everything appropriated for the Army and Navy must of course in some form or other be borrowed.

From this statement it appears that the whole receipts for the year 1815 exceed the expenditure for the civil list, and the payment of the debt, including the Treasury notes reimbursable during the present year, and on the first of January, 1816, by the sum of $1,496,902, which is not more than ought to be left in the Treasury. Everything, therefore, appropriated for the war and Navy must be borrowed. If the Army is reduced to ten thousand, the expenses, including the fortifications commenced, will probably amount to $4,600,000; to which add $2,000,000, a sum necessary for advancing three months' pay to the officers and soldiers, and making the sum necessary for the Military Establishment during the present year, $6,600,000—and supposing the naval expenditures to be reduced one-half, viz: $4,000,000, there will be a saving on the military and naval expenditures of $2,900,000. The chairman of the Military Committee has, I think, estimated the expenditure of the Military department too low—three hundred dollars per man is as low as it ever has been, even in the most favorable period of peace. Mr. E. said, he would have been satisfied at the present moment, until our affairs were settled, to keep the old Peace Establishment, ten thousand. As, however, a majority had pronounced in favor of six thousand, he thought it would save $1,200,000, and afford additional security for taking off the taxes at the next session of Congress.

The revenue from commerce during 1816, will probably yield $16,000,000—and supposing the expenditures during that year to be the same for the civil list and the debt as during the present year, and that there will be reimbursed during that period $10,000,000 of Treasury notes, the expenditures for the next year will exceed the revenue from commerce, exclusive of the military and naval expenditure, by a sum of $2,000,000. This statement shows the necessity of an immediate reduction of our expenditures, unless we mean to perpetuate a system of taxes on the people. Mr. E. said, he was decidedly in favor of reducing the expenditures within such limits as to enable us to take off the taxes during the next session of Congress.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, quoted the laws, passed in 1800, for disbanding the army then authorized by law, with a view to show, that although Congress then intended that Mr. Adams should discharge the army, the terrors of French invasion having subsided, yet they used the terms "authorize and empower," which necessarily implied a discretion in the Executive. He did not intend, by his amendment, to enlarge that discretion; but if it were practicable to discharge some of the soldiers before the first of April, now at the places where they were recruited, and who, by the terms of their enlistment, were entitled to a discharge at the end of the war, he wished it might be done, as he could not see the necessity of marching them one or two hundred miles, at the public expense, to the places of rendezvous, there to discharge them. He concurred entirely with his friend (Mr. EPPES) in the opinion, that there was no necessity for keeping up so large a Peace Establishment as the bill originally contemplated. Gentlemen referred to the state of the world, to the force of the British on our borders, and to the unadjusted territorial and commercial claims of the United States and Great Britain, as affording an argument in favor of a larger number. No species of reasoning, he said, was more plausible or more fallacious; it was the doctrine of those who favored large standing armies, and which had enslaved one-half of the world. If we kept up an army until the affairs of Europe were adjusted, he contended we would have a standing army rivetted upon us forever. They have not been settled for the last hundred years, and may not be for the hundred to come. He had no idea of an armed neutrality; of maintaining an army during peace, as was the practice, and perhaps the duty, of the continental States, whose dominions were separated only by mathematical lines, or small rivers, over which bridges might easily be thrown. He thanked God no nation could bridge the Atlantic, to reach our shores. He would rather rely on the militia to repel sudden invasion than keep up a force enervated by the inactivity of a camp in time of peace—a moth on the public Treasury, eating out the substance of the people, and requiring the payment of heavy taxes. Six thousand men, he believed to be as many as were necessary for a peace establishment; and while he would not, by a peremptory provision, require the President, without reference to circumstances, to disband the Army, neither would he keep up a large military force, to insure a due respect to our rights or interests, as likely to be affected by a treaty of commerce. Such a treaty, he remarked, is in its very nature a matter of contract—of reciprocal concession and advantage—and, he believed, we had more to give than to ask. On the basis of interest, therefore, we might rest that subject. It was true, the British force in our vicinity was considerable; but he contended, that keeping up our own, and predicated that act upon the fact of their having a large force, would have the effect of retaining theirs for a longer period. For it might be retorted by them, if we will not confide in the good faith with which they ratified the treaty, neither will they confide in ours; that those who distrust the motives of others, generally, are actuated by unworthy ones themselves, and therefore we are not to be trusted.

Mr. J. said, he did believe there were not ten thousand men of the present army (perhaps not six thousand) whom the Government could retain by the terms of their enlistment beyond the time necessary for their regular discharge, they having been generally enlisted to serve during the war only; for, in proportion as the prospects of peace brightened, the ranks of the Army had been filled, many men having enlisted as a matter of speculation to obtain the bounties of land and money. Mr. J. said, however, as there was a difference of opinion as to the effect of the amendment, he would withdraw it; and he did so.

On motion of Mr. PEARSON, the word "thereafter" was struck out of the clause above recited.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to add cavalry to the quality of force proposed to be retained; which motion was opposed by Messrs. TROUP and STUART, and negatived.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, moved to amend the section enumerating the officers of each regiment, by inserting one lieutenant colonel and two majors, in lieu of one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, and one major; which motion was opposed by Mr. TROUP, and negatived.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, in consequence of the reduction of the amount of force proposed to be retained, the general officers were also reduced, from two major-generals and four brigadier-generals, to one major general and two brigadiers.

Other discussion took place on amendments, some of which were adopted, and others negatived.

The bill was reported to the House, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, January 24.

Mr. McKIM and Mr. HAWES presented petitions from sundry distillers, praying for a diminution of the duty on spirits distilled, and an increase of the duty on distilled spirits imported; which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SHARP reported without amendment the bill from the Senate for the relief of Bowie and Kurtz, and the bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. YANCEY, the Committee of Claims were discharged from the further consideration of all the subjects which have been referred to them at the present session, yet unacted on.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the Committee of Foreign Relations were discharged from the consideration of sundry papers which had been referred to them during the present session, which, in consequence of peace, they had thought it unnecessary to act on.

The bill from the Senate making appropriations for completing the public building for the Military Academy at West Point, was twice read and committed.

The bill from the Senate to continue in force for a limited time the bill to establish trading houses with the Indian tribes, was twice read and ordered to a third reading.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "to alter and establish certain post roads," were read, and concurred in by the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed "An act to provide for exploring the Chesapeake bay and its waters, for the purposes therein mentioned;" "An act to provide for the ascertaining and surveying of the boundary lines fixed by the treaty with the Creek Indians, and for other purposes;" and "An act to repeal certain acts therein mentioned;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill "to place more effectually in the State Courts and District Courts of the United States the jurisdiction in the cases therein mentioned"—(in cases arising under the internal revenue laws)—which was twice read and committed.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate to repeal (in certain events) the discriminating duties now imposed on foreign tonnage, and on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, reported the same without amendment, and moved that it pass to a third reading.

Mr. SEYBERT said this was a subject of great importance, in which his constituents, as much as any people of the United States, were interested; that it came into the House at too late a period of the session to be fully discussed and maturely considered; that, when heretofore the subject had been brought before the Congress, it had been opposed by petitions from various quarters, which would not now appear, because no such measure was expected to have been agitated at this session. He therefore moved that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. EPPES hoped this motion would not prevail. It was true, on former occasions, when this subject had been before the House, it had excited some sensibility among the merchants; but this was a very different proposition from any which had before been agitated. The bill proposed to take off these countervailing duties when other nations shall adopt corresponding regulations. For his part, Mr. E. said, he believed we were capable of building vessels as cheaply, perhaps more cheaply, than any country on earth, and such a regulation as was proposed, if reciprocal, would prove highly advantageous to our navigation, &c.

Mr. SEYBERT interrupted Mr. EPPES by a withdrawal of his motion to postpone the bill, and it was, on motion of Mr. EPPES, committed to a Committee of the Whole.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States.

On the question to concur in reducing the force to be retained, from ten to six thousand men, there arose an animated and deeply interesting debate.

Mr. HOPKINS rose to oppose the proposed reduction. We had just emerged from a war of no ordinary magnitude, characterized by many sanguinary scenes. If the word peace, written on a piece of paper, in its practical operation, was what its signification imports, he agreed that

6,000 men would be quite enough for the Peace Establishment. But, if we take into view the present situation of the nation, promising ourselves all the benefits which naturally spring from peace, let us look into the circumstances which generally secure its continuance, and see whether, in so greatly reducing our Military Establishment, we shall not be acting with a precipitation we may hereafter be sorry for. The enemy, Mr. H. said, was yet all around us. A narrow strait only separates our lately hostile forces. You are about to disperse your force to their homes; the late enemy keeps his in existence. We cannot expect to prescribe to those who have been our enemy what they shall keep on their own ground. But would it not be premature in us to take the ground proposed and agreed to in Committee? Are the British now not in possession of some of our most important posts? Is there anything magical in the word peace to bind them in good faith to fulfil their engagement to deliver them up? What does the history of former times inform us? In 1783, when the word peace was spoken, it was received with as much avidity, and as much relied upon as it is now; but not until 1793, were those who were hostile to us removed from our country, and not until a treaty upon the subject relieved us from them. West of your mountains, they retained some of our strongest posts. Look at the records and see the rivers of blood, and count the millions of dollars it cost you to drive the savages from your frontier who were fed and supported from those posts. Is the possession of Fort Erie nothing? Of Michilimackinac, the Gibraltar of America, nothing? Are our fleets and posts on the Lakes to be deserted, or left with only an hundred men each for their protection? When the British shall withdraw from our posts; when they shall reduce their forces in our neighborhood; if, when all this is done, our Peace Establishment be too large, it can be reduced. It is always in the power of Congress to reduce it. If we do divest ourselves of all our force before we see this peace going into absolute effect, will it not be premature; will it not, in fact, be an invitation to aggression? There was another consideration of a more general nature opposed to this reduction of the Army. What is a force of ten thousand men to this vast continent? Look at the belt which surrounds you by ocean and land, and answer how, with less than ten thousand men, even in time of profound tranquillity, we can garrison the necessary posts. His honorable colleague had remarked, he said, that if the Indians were affronted, the Western riflemen would subdue them. Though they can do so, their blood and the National treasure must first freely flow; for they are a brave enemy. Besides, they are fellow men; and Christianity teaches us to use the means to prevent their hostility, rather than to be obliged to punish it by extermination hereafter. Our Spanish neighbors, Mr. H. demanded, were they to be entirely trusted at this moment? Did gentlemen recollect how distant from our shores was Havana, one of their strongest holds, and where they keep the strongest military force? Did they recollect the contiguity of Vera Cruz? That Kingdom, in a state of distraction at this moment, may eventually become hostile to the United States. Ought we not to graduate the Peace Establishment to events which might befall us in a year? The Creek Indians, too, Mr. H. said, were yet sore with the beatings they had received. If the Spaniards were hostile, would they not command all that country? Would gentlemen, to guard against all these contingencies, and to meet them when they occurred, rely on taking their fellow-citizens from their farms and firesides to fight our battles, and disband men already in service, who would be very glad to remain in it? New Orleans itself would require for its constant guard one-sixth of the whole force now proposed to be retained. Would gentlemen abandon Plaquemine; keep no force at Coquille? How long was it since a party of pirates lodged themselves in the sea islands, in the vicinity of Orleans, and committed enormities which men shudder to relate, until expelled by our gallant tars? Mr. H. said he believed the people would much rather agree to support an army commensurate to his wishes, than be subject to be harassed and troubled, called away from their fields and firesides on every petty occasion. Our Western country, he said, would always be, for some years to come, in a state of trouble. Russia, he had heard it said, considered herself at peace, when there were not more than thirty or forty thousand men fighting on each side on her borders. So in our Western country, even in time of peace, the moment you enter a sparse settlement you are on hostile ground. Scatter your garrisons along Prairie du Chien, Michilimackinac, the key of the Lakes, and by the time you get to Plattsburg, and have placed in safety and secured your invaluable stores in that direction, you will find your six thousand men dwindling into that sort of insignificance, that, if a foe you have, he will laugh in your face. Our force ought to be ten thousand at least. Common sense and common prudence, Mr. H. appeared to think, would place it much higher. But as the bill had been reported for ten thousand, he would be contented with that, though he was sensible it was bad policy to reduce it so low. Let gentlemen, he said, lay to their hearts the considerations he had urged. When gentlemen objected to keeping up an adequate force, lest it should degenerate into a standing army, he begged them to reflect that they were creating a military host by resorting to militia, and that danger to our civil institutions was much more likely to arise from making every man in the country a soldier, than from keeping up an efficient Peace Establishment. Let us not, said he, by a kind of impetuous haste destroy the benefits we expect from a peace. It is because I wish to see a peace efficient in all its parts, that I would keep up, at least until the next session of Congress, an efficient military force. Our safety requires it, and prudence demands it of us.

Mr. FORSYTH said he was opposed to reducing the military force to be retained to six thousand men; and was desirous of increasing it to at least fifteen thousand men. Time had been, he said, when the recommendations of the Executive of the United States, and persons to whom the Executive offices were committed, had some weight in this House; when the opinions of persons who had examined, in all their details, subjects on which they must be best informed, were considered of some force and authority. I fear, sir, said Mr. F., this time is now passed. The President, in communicating to Congress the Treaty of Peace, called to their recollection the important question of the reduction of our expenditures, and accompanied it with important and rational remarks, adverse to the policy of immediately and inconsiderately disarming ourselves. The Secretary of War had also informed the House, through the Military Committee, that, in the present exigency, at least twenty thousand men ought to be retained in service. And yet, with this rational recommendation of the President of the United States, this recommendation of the officer presiding at the head of the War Department, a proposition has prevailed to reduce the Army to six thousand men! He begged gentlemen to pause, and reflect whether this was an adequate military force. For what was it adequate? It was not sufficient to man our fortifications; it was scarcely sufficient to take care of the arms of the United States. He called the attention of the House to the variety of points necessary to be preserved in a state of defence from New Orleans to Maine; to the chain of posts in the West necessary to prevent Indian excitement. These alone would require more than six thousand men. Were there not also other considerations which forbid the great reduction of the Army which was proposed? What, Mr. F., asked, was our situation in regard to the European Powers? Are not our affairs with Spain wholly unsettled? The territory west of the Perdido was still a subject of dispute. With the knowledge we have of the character of the present King of Spain, would it be prudent to disband all our forces without knowing what were his sentiments in regard to that territory? In regard to Great Britain, it is true we have a Treaty of Peace. But what is it? Nothing but a suspension of hostilities; it does not bind her for her future abstinence from practices which produced the war. Shall we believe, said he, that she will not, on the first moment, avail herself of the opportunity to repeat them? The only obligations on her on this subject are, the wounds her pride and interest have received during this contest. Even her wounded pride may stimulate her to redeem the honor she has lost, by a renewal of hostility. Gentlemen may imagine, and unfortunately there are too many who do imagine, that the justice of Great Britain is such as to induce her to observe with scrupulous fidelity the treaty which has been made. Make it her interest, and she will not violate it. Does not every gentleman recollect how our posts were held by her after the Treaty of 1783, and retained until it became her interest to release them? An honorable gentleman has said, too, that we hold British posts, and the delivery will be reciprocal. But, after we have disbanded our force, she may do in that respect as she pleases. Let us take into view another consideration, said Mr. F., the public sentiment in Great Britain after the news from New Orleans. The public expectation there will have been on tiptoe; the Ministers full of hope and joy at the idea of having struck a blow which would be felt an hundred years thereafter. May we not calculate on some hostility from the deep mortification they will feel on hearing the reality? It may drive the Ministry to a renewal of hostilities against us; or it may drive them from their seats. And who will be their successors? Not the friends of peace with us; not those who will cultivate a good understanding with us; but the Cannings and the Castlereaghs; those who wish us punished for our ingratitude to Great Britain, for "assisting the great destroyer of Europe!" Mr. F. concluded by saying he hoped the reduction to take place would at least be partial, not total, until these questions were settled, until we had not only a peace in name, but a peace in reality.

Mr. SHEFFEY, repeating the observation of Mr. FORSYTH, that the period in our history when Executive recommendations had influence had passed away, said he wished to God it had passed away, and that the time had arrived when such recommendations had no more influence than they merited; for himself, Mr. S. said, he could not bend to Executive recommendations, what he believed the good of his constituents. When he looked at the calamities of the people, and the pressures upon them, he could not bend his opinion to that of the Executive to continue them. If the doctrine of the gentleman was correct, instead of diminishing, we ought to increase our Military Establishment; he having given it as his opinion that the peace was but a truce, a suspension of hostilities, and that we ought to expect a renewal of the war. Had it not been a complaint during the whole of the war that the whole of our military force was not adequate; and was there not now on the table a recommendation to draw out by force the free people of the country into the ranks of the regular army? If we are yet to expect war; if this be but a cessation of hostilities, one of two things follows: either that the recommendation on the table was preposterous, or we ought now to increase the Army. Instead of telling the people that their calamities have ceased, we must commence a system of vigor to obtain an army. Mr. S. said he did not believe six thousand men of our present army would remain, after discharging all those men who were enlisted during the war; and, if the establishment was fixed at ten thousand men, the recruiting officers might at once be sent out to get men. He did not understand the doctrines of the gentleman from Georgia, when he argued that Britain's having been beaten would induce her to renew the war. If we have been thus successful in the contest, and she is thus smarting under the lash, we may reasonably expect some security, that some time will elapse before she engages in a contest on such unequal terms. Nothing but folly worse than madness could induce her to engage in hostilities again. For his part, Mr. S. was for settling the Peace Establishment at six thousand men; if it were larger, the recruiting officers must be again set to work. Of this he had no idea, nor had the people. The time had arrived when these notions would not be borne, and must be abandoned.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, said, he was not a little surprised to see the course taken by some gentlemen on this question. It had been well stated that the enemy was yet in our neighborhood, and was yet in possession of many of our posts. What was now proposed? To reduce the Army to rather less than the last Peace Establishment. Experience ought to dictate a contrary course. Who could recollect the disasters of Harmar, the defeat of St. Clair, and not fear similar results of similar circumstances? Some of the best blood of the nation was spilt because we had not a force to awe the savages and compel the fulfilment of the treaty. Men change with times; there is nothing truer. Examine the Journals of 1805-6 and we shall find sentiments very different from those now uttered from the Federal side of the House. It was then contended, and the Journals will show it, that our Military Establishment was too small, that ten thousand men would be too few for a time of perfect apparent peace. We shall find the votes of these gentlemen at that day to increase the Military Establishment. Now, it seems, with our posts multiplied, our frontier extended, the powerful armies of a nation with whom we have just concluded a peace yet on our frontier, we are to reduce our Army to six thousand men. Have gentlemen become converts to the doctrine they once thought so hostile to the public interest? Would they agree to disarm the nation in the face of an enemy who holds some of our most important posts? He hoped not. He trusted we should at least keep up a force of ten thousand men for the present. The next Congress could reduce it, if the then state of things would authorize them to do so; if our posts were delivered up. When our late enemy reduces his army in our neighborhood, we may more safely do it. Do it now, and we shall invite another war with a nation whose pride is stung by her defeats, and encourage the hostility of another Government with whom we have a serious dispute as to the boundary lines of our territory.

Mr. CALHOUN said, it appeared to him, that, on fixing the Military Peace Establishment, the House were acting rather in the dark, having before them neither the estimates nor the facts on which they were founded. In determining the amount of the Military Establishment, he said, the House ought to take into view three objects, and graduate the force to be retained accordingly—the proper maintenance and garrison of our military posts and fortresses; the retention of so large a force as would keep alive military science, and serve as a seminary for that purpose; and the adaptation of our military force to the policy of the enemy in regard to this country. As regarded either of these objects, it appeared to him the House was not in possession of information to enable it to act understandingly. What force should be necessary to guard our seaports—to protect our northwestern and western frontiers from Indian hostility? Of this there was no estimate, but everything was left to conjecture. As to the second point, practical military men ought to be consulted, whether it would be proper to keep up a military force to maintain military science. The next question was the most important: Have we a sufficient knowledge of the force and policy of the enemy to authorize a reduction of our military force? He contended we had not. What would be the feelings of England on receiving intelligence of the late events, he did not know. Whether the soreness of her recent defeat would produce a disposition to remain at peace, or to retaliate, no gentleman could say. If there was any doubt on the subject, we ought to act with caution in reducing our Military Establishment. What course the enemy will pursue, we cannot determine; whether he will keep up a small peace establishment, or a large military force, we do not know. It ought to be recollected, that he has abundance of military means, and that living is as cheap in Canada as in England. If the enemy should keep up a force on our borders, of thirty or forty thousand men, instead of reducing it to four or five thousand, would it be wise for us wholly to disarm? It would not. Mr. C. said he deprecated such a state of things; but, if the enemy should retain a large force in service, in our vicinity, it would be highly impolitic for us to reduce ours as low as is proposed. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. JACKSON) had, on a former day, remarked that our situation was particularly felicitous, in having no enemy immediately in our neighborhood. But, it ought to be borne in mind that the most powerful nation in Europe possessed provinces adjoining our territory, into which she could readily pour an armed force. He hoped that nation never would, but it might do so. Suppose, with forty thousand men, he chose, without notice, to make a hostile movement against our territory; every strong position on the Niagara frontier would fall at once into his hands, and the very expense we wish to avoid must be quadrupled, to enable us to regain them. Having neither estimates nor facts, as he had before remarked, the House ought to act cautiously. It is easier to keep soldiers than to get them—to have officers of skill and renown in your possession, than to make them. Let us wait awhile before we reduce our Army to a mere Peace Establishment.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH said, that one argument which had been urged in favor of a large Military Establishment, appeared to him to cut both ways. It was contended that it was our duty to keep up a large military force until our late enemy reduces his. Suppose our late enemy, in the same way, should keep up his force, because we keep up ours; we shall maintain our present military forever; and this argument, therefore, goes too far.

It appeared to him, Mr. G. said, that gentlemen holding the affirmative of the question of reduction of the Army to six thousand men, need resort for its support only to the general policy of the country—to the duty of every member of the House, to relieve his constituents from the heavy burdens which must be imposed on them for its support. This argument is sufficiently solid to repel all the arguments he had heard in favor of a larger Military Establishment than six thousand men. The advocates of a larger force had dwelt on the apprehension of a war with Spain, and of a renewal of the war with Britain. Were gentlemen serious? Did they mean to alarm the country by such language? Did they mean to express a wish for a Spanish war? He hoped not. Our complaint against Spain (if any) is, that she has been accessory to the acts of a principal aggressor on our rights. Having released the principal, (France,) he hoped we should not make war upon a secondary Power. As to West Florida, we have possession; and it may be a good reason to raise an army to defend it, whenever we shall have reason to believe it will be attacked, but not before. As to the renewal of war with Great Britain, he had no sort of fear of it. The difficulties which arose in carrying into effect the Treaty of 1783 afforded no argument in favor of the expectation of a similar course now. Britain then complained that we had not complied with some of our stipulations in that treaty, and particularly that which secured to British citizens the debts due to them before the war; and we complained that she did not deliver up some of the Western posts; and both parties were unquestionably to blame. It had been said, that six thousand men would be a smaller Peace Establishment than we had before the war. This, Mr. G. denied. Our Peace Establishment in 1805, about the time our collision with Great Britain broke out, was short of three thousand men; and it was not until this unlucky war, from which we are fortunately freed, was expected to take place, that our Military Establishment was nominally increased to ten thousand men. At this time, he could not see any necessity for preparing for war; he could not think Congress would be justified in maintaining any further burden on the people than was necessary to garrison the various posts in the United States. They would not, he thought, do their duty to their country, if they went beyond six thousand men.

Mr. PICKERING said, he held in his hand the Message of the President of the United States, transmitting to the Congress a Treaty of Peace and Amity with Great Britain. He had supposed this an authentic document; that we really had been at peace; that we had been rejoicing and illuminating for peace. But were he or any other person to form his opinions on the words used by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) he should conclude that we were still at war. That gentleman had urged, as a conclusive reason, why we should not reduce the Army below ten thousand men, that we did not yet know the disposition of the enemy! The President's recommendation for the maintenance of an adequate regular force having been read by one gentleman, Mr. P. begged the attention of the House to another passage, which he read, expressing the sanguine hope and belief that the Treaty of Peace would be a lasting foundation of the most friendly intercourse. The sentiments now expressed on one side of the House appeared to him to be of a character directly opposed to this; and would have a tendency to stir up all the sentiments which had existed, and should only exist in a state of war. If we have peace in fact; if we are desirous of renewing friendly intercourse with Great Britain, we should lay aside all enmity, and forbear any expressions calculated to keep alive that irritability which has existed in time past, against the nation with whom we are now at peace. If we desire a renewal of friendly intercourse, we ought to lay aside unfounded suspicions, and act upon the state of things declared and established by the treaty. There was one argument that had been so often repeated, he could not omit noticing it, though he had been substantially anticipated by the gentleman from Maryland. In the Treaty of 1783, there was a stipulation that neither nation should throw any impediment in the way of the recovery of debts due from citizens of one nation to citizens of the other. It was a notorious fact, that such impediments were thrown in the way by some of the States, the consequence of which was, that Great Britain kept possession of the posts she was to have given up to us. The surrender of the posts, and the removal of legal impediments to the collection of old British debts, took place at one and the same time; and, unquestionably, as the gentleman who last spoke had observed, on both sides there was blame. Mr. P. said he was well aware that he could neither speak or write, if he had any reference to Great Britain in any way, but it was said that he was a British advocate. His conduct throughout the war of the Revolution, and since, ought to contradict the insinuation. I am, said he, an American citizen, and know no other predilection. But he might add, that after the Treaty of 1794, the Board of Commissioners under that treaty were broken up, and no measures were taken for the payment of those British debts; and it was not until the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, that a treaty was entered into, and ratified by him, whereby the United States were pledged to pay those debts, computed at a certain sum. Without waiting for that payment, Britain did surrender the posts. But, it had been said, we ought to keep up a large force if Great Britain did. Great Britain, remote as she is from her provinces, has much stronger reason for keeping up a large force there than the United States could have for maintaining a corresponding force. The continuing to harbor such suspicions, Mr. P. said, would, more than all other things, tend to produce another war. But could any gentleman seriously apprehend another war after what had taken place at the close of this? It had been said that the pride of Great Britain would be wounded by the events at New Orleans. To this Mr. P. answered, she had made peace without knowing the result of that expedition. Why did she make peace? Some supposed, on account of the aspect of affairs in Europe. Mr. P. rather attributed it to the state of things in Great Britain. The sentiments of the opposition in both Houses, we know to have been favorable to peace. The sense of the people of England on that head, may be gathered also from the vast number of petitions for peace with the United States. It may also be attributed to the conviction experience had taught, of its being clearly the interest of Great Britain to be at peace with us. She wants a vent for her manufactures. Her merchants had supposed, when the whole Continent was open to her, there would be an insatiable market for her commodities. There was an error in that speculation, and many of her merchants were injured, if not ruined, by engaging in it. The Continent was inundated by British manufactures; the people of the Continent were unable, or not inclined to purchase, and the goods remained in consequence in the hands of the exporters. The British nation, therefore, so large a portion of whose people are manufacturers, were anxious for peace with the United States, that this better market than any other should be open to them. This is the great reason why they desired peace with us. Mr. P. adverted to the recent disaster of the British army before New Orleans. If it had only happened to those who were on our coast before, during the last Summer; to Admiral Cochrane and his command, (whose lust for plunder was well known,) the effect would have been very different on the British nation, though, had the attempt succeeded, it would have made fortunes for him and all his officers. But the expedition was fitted out with the approbation and under the eyes of the British Ministry, by whom it was provided with an immense number of troops and vast equipments, destined expressly for the subjugation of New Orleans. Before the issue of that expedition was known, from which complete success must have been anticipated, the same Ministry concluded a peace. When the result of that expedition is known in England, the Ministry, he said, must be disgraced, and probably driven from their seats. Who will succeed them? The Cannings, as the gentleman from Georgia supposes? No. Mr. Canning himself is now a Minister, appointed by the present Ministry, to represent that Government in Portugal. Their successors will be those very members of opposition in both Houses of Parliament who have clamored for a peace with America. But, the gentleman from South Carolina says, Great Britain has a great army in Canada, and may attack us if we disarm ourselves. What motive can she have to do so? If they made peace when they were in possession of very important posts on our frontier, and expected New Orleans to fall, how can we expect they will attack us for the purpose of conquest? [Mr. CALHOUN explained, that he had not asserted that such would be the case, but only put a case to show the policy of keeping up a respectable military force. The loss of Detroit, at the commencement of the war just closed, for the want of adequate officers and force, had occasioned more than half the whole expense of the war.] Mr. PICKERING resumed. Instead of our maintaining a vast military force, at an expense which will require a continuance of the present oppressive taxation on the people, he said we ought to reduce the Army and relieve the people from a load of taxes, by which they were almost crushed. We ought to husband our means instead of exhausting them, because it is possible a war may take place, God knows when. Great Britain may maintain a considerable force in Canada, but, if she does, it ought to give no umbrage to the United States. Why will she probably keep up a large force in Canada? From the apprehension of such a sudden incursion from the United States as took place three years ago. So far from expecting invasion, Mr. P. said he would be willing to raze to the foundation all our posts on the frontier. Great Britain was smarting, he remarked, under the effects of more than twenty years' war; the nation sighed for repose, and assuredly would not suffer the Ministry to engage in a new war with the United States. One gentleman, Mr. P. said, had referred to the Spaniards, and intimated that, as we had some differences with them, we therefore ought not to disband our army. We very well know, and certainly do not fear, the military strength of Spain. The feebleness of that Government, especially with its present head, leaves us nothing to fear in that quarter. After the signal defeat of a very large British force at New Orleans, what motive can Spain have to enter into a war with us? The effect of that defeat will be felt not only in Great Britain, but in Spain. She is weak; in her provinces bordering on the United States peculiarly weak. Her internal distraction forbade the possibility almost, certainly the probability, of her thinking of war with the United States. These were briefly the reasons, Mr. P. said, which satisfied him that the force of our Military Establishment ought to be reduced at least as low as had been voted in Committee of the Whole. He should, for his own part, be satisfied with that number. Running along the whole frontier, he believed that six thousand men would be abundantly sufficient for all the purposes of defence and security. Very small garrisons would be sufficient in most of our seaports to keep the fortifications in repair. Except New York, he did not know one that would require more than two hundred men, many not more than fifty, and some not more than twenty-five.

Mr. TROUP rose for the purpose of correcting some erroneous statements which had been made, greatly exaggerating the amount of expenditure necessary for a Military Peace Establishment. If the Army was to be destroyed, he added, let it be by fair argument, and not by erroneous calculations of the cost.

Mr. GROSVENOR rose to assign the reasons why he should, in his vote on the present occasion, differ from most of his friends. He considered this a totally distinct question from fixing and voting a Peace Establishment. He did not believe this was the time, or that the House had the necessary information on which to fix the Military Peace Establishment; and this was the real question presented to the House. It had been said, and truly, that the British nation have on our soil posts of the utmost importance yet unrelinquished. It is a fact, that many tribes of the Indian nations are yet in a state of disturbance, with whom we have no treaty, no peace, or security for a peace. This House did not yet know the manner and spirit in which the Treaty of Peace had been concluded. He regretted that the President had not laid before Congress the correspondence in regard to this very treaty. To have done so would have been no violation of principle, because the President had on a former occasion adopted that course. To this treaty, Mr. G. said, was opposed in England perhaps the strongest party in that country; and, whatever gentlemen might think, this treaty was not very cordially received in this country, notwithstanding all our illuminations and rejoicings. He thought he had already seen symptoms of dissatisfaction at it in debate. Mr. G. said, he had been early taught to respect the wisdom of the maxim, that to be sure of peace you must be prepared for war. If ever this maxim had application or point, it applied to the very circumstances in which we are placed; to this state of things, wherein the enemy has possession of so much of our soil, and several of our strongest posts, of the redemption of which we have no certainty but the reliance on her faith. In this unsettled state of things, the maxim to which he had referred had made a deep impression on him. He did not know, but, in the opinion of many gentlemen, the faith of the English nation might be relied on. Mr. G. inclined to think it might; but upon this occasion he would be guarded at all points; he would rely on established maxims of policy, instead of relying on the faith of any nation. We have tried a great number of experiments, but there is yet another, it appears. Was it ever before heard of, that on the bare signature of peace, its late antagonist remaining on its soil and borders, that a nation disarmed itself altogether? To be sure, it will occasion some additional expense to retain our force in existence, but to disband our forces at once and entirely, would have a bad influence, and the world would have a right to say, we had escaped from the contest so completely worn down by its pressure that we could not even act up to the ordinary rules of prudence. If this force should be disbanded, and an unfortunate collision should again arise, what expenses and losses may we have to encounter hereafter, in order to save a comparatively trifling expense now? What would be the expense of supporting four or five thousand men for a few months, when put into the balance against those evils which may grow out of a different course? In all these matters, Mr. G. said, it appeared to him that a nation acts wisely when it acts according to maxims established by prudence, and sanctioned by experience. The history of the world, he boldly pronounced, did not afford an instance in which any nation had completely disarmed itself in the circumstances in which this nation was placed.

Mr. GHOLSON said, that, for his part, he should not act on the presumption of the inexecution of the Treaty of Peace; if he did, he should feel himself bound to retain the Military Establishment on its present footing. On the contrary, however, he should act on the principles of the President's Message; on the hope that Great Britain would carry the treaty into effect; because, from the events of the war just terminated, he believed it to be as little her interest as ours to renew the war. But, while freely and frankly avowing this sentiment, he could not, under other views of the subject, agree to the rapid reduction of the Army, which was proposed. Was there anything in the present situation of the country which required a smaller force than we had had for several years before the declaration of war? We have an extent of three or four thousand miles of frontier, on which are a number of points requiring garrisons; we are in hostility with a great many Indian tribes, and our affairs with Spain are yet unsettled. Everything considered, he thought the Army ought not to be reduced below ten thousand men. No man in the House was more solicitous than himself to reduce the public expenditures; and he entertained a strong hope that they would be so reduced by the reduction of the Army, &c., that the next Congress might repeal nearly all the taxes that have been laid.

Mr. DESHA said, that he did not regret that he had brought this subject forward, for it was necessary for the nation to know, whether they were to be saddled with a large standing army in time of peace, or a moderate Peace Establishment. But he regretted that the question should take up so much time in debate at this late period of the session, notwithstanding there has been so much eloquence displayed. The question on this amendment was, on Saturday, carried in the Committee of the whole House by a majority of nineteen votes, where I did hope it was sufficiently discussed, and where I did believe it was sufficiently understood; but gentlemen have come forward with a new string of arguments against the proposition. Do they suppose that the House do not understand the subject, or do they suppose that, by this great flow of eloquence, they can make the substantial part of the House change their opinions in so short a time? When I speak of the substantial part of the House, I mean those who think much and speak but little; who make common sense their guide, and not theoretical or visionary projects. Mr. D. said he should not have arisen to trouble the House with a single remark, but for that positive statement made by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. FOSYTH,) who stated, in a very positive manner, that six thousand men were not sufficient to garrison the outposts. How does the gentleman know this?

H. OF R.

Military Peace Establishment.

FEBRUARY, 1815.

What data does he judge from? If he has any correct data on which he bottoms his calculations, he ought to give them to the House. But I shall take for granted that he has none; that it is a mere guess, notwithstanding the positive manner in which it has been asserted. I have made some calculations, and, as I observed on yesterday, there is not more than twenty-five or thirty forts in all, which, it is presumed, are not all necessary to be kept up in a time of peace. I much question if it is necessary to keep up more than twenty. Will not one hundred men, on an average, be sufficient to man each fort? It is true, some may perhaps require two hundred, but others will not require more than twenty-five or thirty men. Then, sir, you will have upwards of one-half of the 6,000, as contemplated by the amendment, for other purposes. But some gentlemen advocate 10,000, and others 20,000, of a standing army. The policy is easy to be seen through; the advocates of a perpetual system of taxation discover that, if they cannot retain a considerable standing army, they will have no good plea for rivetting the present taxes on the people. I was an advocate for taxes when taxes were necessary in support of the war, but as soon as it can be done, consistent with propriety, I shall be in favor of removing the heaviest of them. Commerce brought us into the war, and I am for making commerce pay the principal part of the debt incurred by the war, and not suffer the people to be ground down to dust by heavy taxation. Mr. D. said, if the argument of his colleague (Mr. Hopkins) proved anything, it proved too much; it proved, that while there was the least speck in the political horizon abroad, that was not favorable to us, we must keep up large standing armies to guard against possible difficulties. This is a kind of doctrine inconsistent with the peaceful habits of republics, and calculated to oppress the people by heavy burdens, instead of ameliorating their condition. The gentleman tells us that we have been menaced by the Spaniards, and, therefore, ought to keep a force in pay sufficient to repel any attempt on their part. But he has defeated his purpose by his own remarks, by saying, the Spaniards are in an unsettled state; that they are in a state of internal distraction, and, therefore, it is uncertain what moment they may pounce upon us. Sir, a moment's recurrence to common sense would be sufficient to discover the fallacy of these remarks. Is it to be presumed, while they are in a state of internal distraction, that we have anything to apprehend from them? certainly not. They will have enough to do to settle their own affairs—to keep their own Government from being overturned—without turning their eye to foreign wars, even if they had any just cause of complaint against us, which I deny. And would it be wise to keep up large standing armies in time of peace, to the oppression of our own people, because there is a distant possibility of being attacked by the Spaniards? Mr. D. said, we are either at war or we have peace; if we are at war, not a single man ought to be discharged; if we are at peace, it would be inexpedient to keep more regulars than was sufficient to garrison our outposts and secure our frontiers. He thought that six thousand were sufficient for these purposes, and therefore hoped the amendment would be adopted. One word in relation to other remarks made by the gentleman from Georgia. He laments that more respect is not paid to recommendations from the Executive. Mr. D. said, there was no man in the nation had a higher opinion of the goodness and purity of the intentions of the Executive than he had, and such recommendations always had due weight with him, and would continue to create a preponderance in all cases of a doubtful character; but as man is fallible, and liable to err, as a Representative of a free people he should take the liberty on this, as well as on all cases, where no doubt existed, of exercising his own judgment, holding himself responsible for his conduct to those whom he had the honor to represent.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, said, he heartily coincided in sentiment with that part of the President's Message which had been quoted by the gentleman from Massachusetts. He meant, he said, to endeavor, as much as lay in his power, to cultivate peace and friendship with Great Britain. If that nation would let us alone, he was willing to forget what had passed. He had no inclination to renew hostilities with her, and he hoped that all the members of this body corresponded with him in the feeling; but, to disarm ourselves altogether, would be just as wise as, when a warm day comes, to throw off all our clothes, expecting winter was over. Although the President had expressed in his Message pacific purposes, he also expressed an opinion, in which Mr. R. fully concurred, adverse to a sudden or total reduction of our military force. Taking into view the present state of the world, and the probability that the calm in Europe is nothing but the precursor of a violent storm, though he sincerely desired it might be otherwise, Mr. R. conceived it would be highly imprudent to part with so great a proportion of our army as was proposed. The President had expressed sentiments in direct opposition to those of the gentleman from Massachusetts, who had quoted another part of the Message. [Mr. R. here quoted the part of the Message recommending the retention of a respectable military force.] This, he said, was a very plain talk, and far from coinciding with the inferences drawn from that part of the Message recommending the cultivation of friendly sentiments towards Great Britain. The best writing, even the Holy Book itself, might be distorted from its meaning and general intent, by quoting detached sentences of it. The recommendation of the Executive is, in effect, that the Military Establishment be not so reduced, as that other nations may take advantage of its diminution. Mr. R. said he respected the gentleman from New York for the opinions he had just delivered; they were manly and noble; he highly approved them. Suppose the Military Establishment to be reduced to six, four, or three thousand men; we know, said Mr. R., who have been obliged to bear the responsibility of the war, and who have disavowed any responsibility. If there should be any encroachments on us on account of our weakness, the very majority of this House would be accused of want of foresight and wisdom in disbanding the Army. Mr. R. said he had no inclination to subject himself to this condition. Unless there should be a correspondent reduction of force by our late enemy, he would not consent to reduce the Army so greatly as was proposed. It had been said we ought to rely wholly on militia for defence. Militia generally, he said, would do their duty, and that manfully, when called on; but we know that our late enemy have been permitted to hold on a large portion of our territory, without molestation from the militia. He would not consent to subject the United States to a continuation or repetition of that disgrace, by a total disbandment of the Army.

Mr. STOCKTON said, that the subject of reducing the Army was very important—the pressure of the late war had already borne heavily upon the people, and would soon be more distinctly felt in the form of taxes by every man and in every family. He had, upon due consideration, determined to vote in favor of the amendment made in Committee, reducing the Peace Establishment to six thousand men. Nothing, however, would have induced him to take any part in the debate, but the alarming course of argument pursued on the other side of the House. The strange suggestions to which he alluded, coming as they did from a gentleman of standing—the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations—and similar sentiments expressed by other gentlemen, had really alarmed him. He feared that all was not right. He was apprehensive, that there was some mystery in the present views of the Government, which was judged unfit to be communicated either to the people or their representatives. He feared that some design which could not be avowed, was maturing, to keep up a large standing army in time of peace; or that the peace lately negotiated, which had been hailed with so much enthusiasm, was deceptive; that the people had been amused, and would be deceived in their expectation of permanent peace and increasing prosperity. He could not but be alarmed to find that the Secretary of War had recommended the keeping up a regular army of 20,000—to hear that this plan met the approbation of the Administration, and to see that it found advocates in that House. Mr. S. said that it appeared to him as if gentlemen had forgotten not only the first principles of our Government, but had determined to renounce all the sentiments which their friends had formerly avowed.

Mr. S. said, that if there was any one principle which might be called fundamental to our civil institutions, and which above all others had received the decided approbation of the friends of civil liberty in the United States without distinction of party, it was this—that a standing army was not to be tolerated in time of peace. It formed a prominent cause of complaint in the vindication of independence, and was denounced in many of the State constitutions—it was directly in opposition to the uniform opinion of our sages and patriots. Yet the plan seemed to have made many new friends. All the common-place reasons in favor of such a measure (and none other had been urged) had been resorted to—reasons which always had been and always would be pressed into such a service. Such as, the unsettled state of the world; large armies kept up by rival Powers; the unruly disposition of savage tribes; the necessity of always being prepared for war to preserve peace. This and the like species of drapery always had and ever would be held up to conceal the real motives of political action. The same arguments had been used for more than a century to support the same measure, and served only to prove a solemn truth, that an army was always in favor of those in power. Mr. S. said, that he imputed nothing remarkable to the Government for cherishing such a means of patronage and power, but thought it became the representatives of the people to discourage and restrain it. For his own part he would not vote for a man more than was absolutely necessary for common garrison duty. He was, however, more alarmed at the sentiments expressed in regard to the peace. The honorable gentleman had urged as a reason against reducing the Army, that we had no security for the duration of the peace; that the British Government had not relinquished its pretensions; and that if the same causes of war should occur again, the peace would also have an end. And the gentleman also added, that our condition was only that of a free or suspended hostility. Mr. S. said, that this was alarming information indeed; and his only consolation was derived from a conviction, that it was wholly unfounded. He asked if it could be possible that the treaty lately negotiated was mere deception? He hoped and believed that it was not, but that it had been produced by the dear-bought experience, that nothing was to be gained by the war. The error into which the gentleman had fallen was this: he supposed that, as the British Government had not relinquished its pretensions, the causes of war still existed, and might again produce hostility, if again resorted to by that Government. But Mr. S. said, that this opinion was not correct; the honorable gentleman seemed to have forgotten that we had declared the war, and were the complainants, and that, going to war for specific causes, when we made a general peace without providing for them, we must be considered as having abandoned them. There existed no necessity for the British to give up their pretensions, unless they intended so to do; so far from it, by the acknowledged laws of nations, every cause of war not provided for by the treaty is considered as given up, and can never be again made the foundation of hostility, without a breach of public faith. This rule was general, and had received the unqualified approbation of the most approved writers upon the law of nations. A treaty of peace not only puts an end to the war, but abolishes the cause of it. The party who made the war, and then the peace, can never again recommence hostilities for the same causes;

hence, in modern treaties, there will always be found a leading provision, that the peace shall be firm or perpetual, or universal, or of the like import, the meaning of which is, not that there shall be no future war, but that peace is to be perpetual, as far as respects the former points of difference.*

Mr. S. said, that the operation of this principle of national law upon the subject, was obvious. We had gone to war ostensibly on account of the Orders in Council; we had continued it because of impressments from American merchant vessels; we complained, as occasion required, about blockades and other subordinate matters. As to the Orders in Council, the treaty did not operate upon that subject, because they had been repealed at the beginning of the war, and did not constitute a matter in dispute when the treaty was signed—therefore that subject was not touched by the treaty. If they should again be renewed, we should have the same right to go to war on that account as we had before, and no more; but he thought that there was not the remotest probability that the British Government, after having voluntarily abandoned them, would ever again resort to such an experiment. But the causes for which the war had been continued after the repeal of those orders, and after the offer of an armistice and pacific arrangement, stood upon a different footing, and were expressly within the principle. At the head of the list was the point of impressment. We claimed that our flag should cover and protect all persons on board our merchantmen. We continued the war because of the right claimed and exercised by the British to search, and to take away their own subjects; and because of the abuse of that right in often taking real American citizens under pretence that they were subjects. Yet the treaty is silent upon the matter; not a letter is to be found in it impairing or even regulating the exercise of the claim. We can never, therefore, maintain that our flag shall cover the persons on board our merchant ships. Nor, if we act with good faith, can we ever again go to war for the common abuses heretofore practised—for these were the causes of the war, which this peace has ended; all that can be left to us, acting bona fide, is to endeavor by amicable arrangements to provide against abuses of that claim, which this treaty has converted into an acknowledged right. The same might be said of blockades and the rest of our maritime pretensions.

* Vattel, lib. 4, chap. 2. sect. 19—"The effect of a treaty of peace, is to put an end to the war, and to abolish the subject of it. It leaves the contracting parties without any rights of committing hostility either for the subject which kindled the war, or for what has passed in the course of it; it is therefore no longer permitted to take up arms for the same cause; accordingly in these treaties the parties reciprocally oblige themselves to a perpetual peace, which is not to be understood as if the contracting parties promised never to make war on each other, for any cause whatever. Peace relates to the war which it terminates, and as it forbids the revival of the same war, by taking up arms for the cause which at first kindled it, is in reality perpetual."

The treaty was silent—the enemy would not suffer them to be named—they are all given up—we have ourselves abandoned the new doctrine of "Free Trade and Sailors' Rights," and can never again rightfully draw the sword on those pretensions.

Mr. S. said that he did not state this by way of reproach against the Government, for concluding such a peace—he had predicted and rejoiced at the event. It had saved the country, which was enough for him. He should not venture even to give a character to the peace, nor insinuate that it was not such as it ought to have been. He only wished that the people might understand it—that it might pass for what it was worth, and no more. Mr. S. said that the general principle of public law, which he had laid down, was not only just in itself, but its application to our case had been anticipated and recognised by the Administration; were it not for such a principle, war would be interminable. Peace would indeed be nothing more than a truce. What nation would make peace with its enemy merely to afford time for better preparation, if the war might be recommenced on the old grounds when he was inclined so to do? When he said that the Administration had recognised this principle of public law, he spoke from documents which could not err. In the instructions from the Department of State to our Ministers at Ghent, bearing date April 15th, 1812, Mr. Monroe says—"I have to repeat, that the great object which you have to secure, in regard to impressment, is, that the flag shall protect the crew. Your first duty is to conclude a peace with Great Britain, and you are authorized to do it, in case you can obtain a satisfactory stipulation against impressment; one which will secure under our flag protection to the crew." "If this encroachment is not provided for, the United States have appealed to arms in vain. If your efforts to accomplish it should fail, you will return home without delay."

In the instructions of the 28th January 1814, these words will be found: "On impressment, as to the right of the United States to be exempt from it, I have nothing new to add—the sentiments of the President have undergone no change on this important subject. This degrading practice must cease; our flag must protect the crew, or the United States cannot consider themselves as an independent nation."

In a report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, on the subject of impressment, of 29th January 1813, it is said: "To appeal to arms, and to lay them down without securing it, would be considered in no other light than a relinquishment of it."

But the most important public document upon the point, was the instructions to our Ministers of the 27th June, 1814, because these were sent after the peace in Europe was known to this Government. In that despatch is the following sentence: "As it is not the intention of the United States, in suffering the treaty to be silent on the subject of impressment, to admit the British claim thereon, or to relinquish that of the United States,

'it is highly important that any such inference should be entirely precluded by a declaration, or protest, in some form or other, that the omission is not to have such a tendency.'

Mr. S. asked whether the treaty contained any such declaration, or protest—whether any other instrument of protest had been communicated to the British Ministers before the treaty was signed? No such paper has been communicated, and none existed. Suppose, instead of such a protest, distinct propositions had been made by our Ministers on the point of impressment, and had been instantly rejected, would not this put the point beyond doubt? If such was not the fact, why had not all the papers accompanying the treaty been laid before the House? For these reasons, Mr. S. said, he saw no cause to fear that the war would be renewed if the United States acted with good faith. He looked for a durable peace, in the interest which both parties had in maintaining it. But if the enemy should so act as to bring about war again, without fault of ours, the country would yet be safe. We could soon have as good an army as that now to be disbanded. And until we had, the people could defend themselves. We want no mercenary army to defend the country on sudden emergencies.

Our safety lies in the spirit, bravery, and patriotism of the people. Did we want proof of this? Let us cast our eyes to Sackett's Harbour, Plattsburg, and particularly to New Orleans, where the brave militia of the country, aided by their Western brethren, with no other aid than two skeleton regiments, had repulsed the enemy with signal slaughter. This had taught the world a lesson, how freemen would defend their homes. Why then, Mr. S. asked, should we keep up this army at the expense of many millions of dollars? For one, he would not consent to it. The taxes imposed on the people were enormous; they could not be dispensed with until our finances and credit were restored. We should retrench as much as possible. Lop off every unnecessary article of expense, and commence a system of rigid economy. Upon the whole, he trusted that the amendment made in Committee would be confirmed in the House by a decided majority.

Mr. Macon said, he would not take up the treaty or its merits, nor discuss the subject of Executive recommendations; but he should confine himself to the question of what it would be proper for the United States to do in the present state of things. Six or ten thousand men were nothing as a war establishment. If the treaty was only a truce, we ought not to stop at ten thousand men; instead of disbanded our forces, we ought to go on recruiting them, to be prepared for the state of things which will take place when the truce expires. But, Mr. M. said, he took the treaty for a covenant of peace, and he was willing, in good faith, to carry it into effect. There was a mistake, on the part of some gentlemen, in regard to what had been the original Peace Establishment. During all the trouble between this country and Spain and Britain, no addition had been authorized to the old Peace Establishment.

until after the attack upon the Chesapeake, and when the law then passed there was great dispute about the title of it, that the additional force might not be considered a part of the Military Peace Establishment. The old Peace Establishment consisted of one brigade only. With that force we had taken possession of Louisiana; with that force we had maintained it, besides keeping garrisons in most of our present forts. The Indians, he thought, might be safely left to themselves; our forts would not now be increased, and all the force that appeared to him necessary, was so much as should be sufficient to keep our works in repair. The true way to make our militia efficient, is to let them know that the safety of the nation depends on them, and to take nothing more from the products of their labor to support regular soldiers, than is absolutely necessary. In proportion as men live easily and comfortably, in proportion as they are free from the burdens of taxation, they will be attached to the Government in which they live. For his part, Mr. M. said, he should be willing to reduce the Army to the old Peace Establishment, of three thousand men.

As to the Indian hostilities, Mr. M. apprehended we should now hear very little of them. The Northwestern Company had been at the bottom of the Indian wars; and it was now their interest to end them. So long as the British Ministry were on an amicable footing with this Government, so long the Indians will remain at peace. It was no matter what men composed the British Ministry, and therefore immaterial in this debate; whether they are the Cannings, Castlereags, or Wellesleys, it is our duty to consider them all as devoted to the British interests.

As to Spain, Mr. M. said, he considered the question settled as to the territory west of the Perdido. The people of Tennessee and Georgia had settled that question. If he had been so inclined, would Ferdinand of Spain have missed the favorable opportunity afforded by the double war in which we were engaged, to have made an attempt on the country? Once settle that country, said he, and you will want no garrisons there. The late enemy had calculated much from the operation of its army against Orleans. If they were satisfied with the treaty under a belief of that army being victorious, and the key of the whole Western country being in their possession, would they be dissatisfied with it now, when that army was ascertained to be destroyed, and the design of conquest totally defeated? The events in that quarter might be urged in England as a reason for putting the Ministers out of power, but not as a reason for violating the treaty. Mr. M. said he should be glad to see a reduction of the Army now. His experience had shown him that, if there was a difficulty in raising men and laying taxes, there was a greater difficulty in getting rid of both. He had heard strong arguments zealously urged why taxes should not be repealed when they were not necessary, and he was certain they would not be repealed if they were made necessary by keeping up a large military force. The security of this nation reposes not on a large military force, but on the happiness and freedom of the people. It is much cheaper to carry on a war with regulars than militia, but a regular army ought not to be kept up in time of peace. What enabled the people to stand the pressure of the restrictive system, but the lightness with which they were borne upon by taxes? History almost universally proves, that in proportion as you rely on regulars, militia lose their efficacy and utility. You must let the militiaman know, he must feel, that on him, and others like him, the safety of the nation rests, and not on a standing army. He hoped the House would concur in reducing the number of men to six thousand; though he should like it well if it were reduced still lower.

Mr. McKim said, he was opposed to the amendment for reducing the force of the Army as low as six thousand men. He was not thus opposed to it from any apprehension of insincerity in the peace between the United States and Great Britain; but he was in favor of proceeding on the common rules of prudence and caution. The late enemy had at this time a large force on our coasts and borders, say thirty five thousand men; and with Great Britain, as a rival nation, holding so powerful a force in our neighborhood, it was not, in his opinion, compatible with prudence to reduce the Military Establishment. In his dealings in social life, he said, when he paid money to any man, of ever so great and unquestionable integrity, he took a receipt for the money; and if such a person owed him money, he took his bond or note for it; and, with these documents, he could, if necessary, defend his right before a legal tribunal. But it was not so between nations, whose last and best appeal was force. It became the duty of nations, therefore, not indiscreetly to disarm themselves. He said he was friendly to a small Military Establishment, and was willing to reduce ours in moderation. In the existing state of society, without indulging in ungenerous suspicions, it would be most wise and prudent never to put ourselves in the power of other nations.

Mr. Wright said he rose, not to speak to the reduction of the Army, having already expressed his opinion on that subject, but briefly to reply to the gentleman from New Jersey. (Mr. Stockton,) who had just told the House that we went to war for "free trade and sailors' rights," illegal blockades and spoliations; that he will not speak of the character of the peace, and yet, in the same breath, tells us that the right of impressment has been given up, the right of blockade has been given up, and our claim for spoliation has been given up. I should be glad to know, said Mr. W., how he could more pointedly have given a character to the peace, or, indeed, more incorrectly have given that character. Sir, after the advice of the President to cultivate harmony in every section of the Union, and, indeed, when remarks tending to irritate Great Britain have been rebuked on this floor, I had hoped that remarks calculated to stir up the angry passions among our selves would have been forborne. I, for one, was prepared to act on the principle of amnesty—to drop the curtain of oblivion on the past, and to cultivate union, so necessary for the harmony and prosperity of the nation. Sir, the war was declared to arrest the practice of impressment and illegal blockades under the Orders in Council, and to obtain satisfaction for spoliations; objects admitted on all sides to justify the war. But the gentleman has told us that they have all, by the treaty, been given up. He has forgotten his own remarks on former occasions—that Britain never claimed the right of the impressment of our seamen, but to take her own. He has forgotten that he pressed us to put a stop to the further progress of the war, as the Orders in Council were revoked; and yet he says, the right of impressment has been given up; that the right of blockade has been given up, and no compensation for spoliation has been obtained. Sir, it will be recollected by all, that Great Britain never claimed the right of impressment of American seamen, and, of course, that the right would not have been among the causes of the war; but that she claimed the right to take British seamen sailing under the flag of the United States, and, under pretence of that claim, impressed our seamen. Sir, the Orders in Council imposing illegal blockades were revoked almost contemporaneously with the declaration of war, and before she knew it was declared, but I never had a doubt that our preparations for the war of which she was informed, at the revocation of the Orders in Council, was the cause of that revocation;—of course these Orders in Council and illegal blockades were abandoned long before the treaty, and, of course, it could not be necessary, by treaty to effect what had been done without, by the war. The practice of impressment was also, by the war, determined, and we can never forget that the Opposition contended that they had very few seamen impressed, fewer by far than we are taught were given up and restored to liberty, but kept as prisoners of war, although captured in time of peace, as their friends called it. I ask, then, if the right of impressment of American seamen, never claimed, has been given up? or the right of blockade, given up without treaty, has been revived by its not being inserted in the treaty? And I also ask, if the claim of Great Britain to take her own seamen has not been agreed to by the treaty, if she has not, upon the gentleman's principles, abandoned it? So much, sir, as to impressment and blockades. Now, upon the subject of spoliations. I humbly ask, if they have not been remunerated? They took nine hundred and seventeen ships in time of peace; we endeavored to regain them by replevin, but they were eluded, or rather purloined, and we obtained a capias in withernam, whereby we have legally taken two thousand of her ships, richly laden, of double the value of ours so purloined. I then ask, if this be not perfect satisfaction, and if it would be lawful to release the ships they took after being thus remunerated by a condemnation on our capias in withernam? Sir, I am sorry to hear that gentlemen condemn their friends in the Senate, where the treaty was unanimously ratified. Would they have ratified a treaty giving up the right of impressment? Would they have given up the right of blockade, or any other right? Would they have unanimously ratified so dishonorable a treaty? It would be as foul a calumny on their patriotism as it would be on their understanding, to give such a construction to the treaty. Sir, I trust the whole American people will be satisfied with the peace, and will consider the war as a demonstration of the strength of Republican Governments, founded on the affection of a free people, not like those Governments of slaves, executed by force or fear, and I have no doubt will demonstrate to Great Britain our strength; that we have not only the power but the will, anything in the Federal Opposition to the contrary notwithstanding, and convince her that America, united, is invincible.

Mr. FARROW was in favor of a small Peace Establishment. We had gone to war, he said, with a very small regular force, and, after the conclusion of a peace, we ought at least to reduce the Army to the amount of force we had at a time when war was daily expected. If ever we again go to war, he said, we shall act on the defensive only, and our militia, in every quarter of the country, are prepared to defend the soil. From the experience of the past war we shall derive immunity from aggression, because our citizen soldiers have shown themselves capable of defending the soil. They now know, if they ever before doubted it, that it will be in vain to invade us. If you want Canada, said he, entice the British Government, if you can, to attack you, and the militia will soon follow an enemy over the lines. Foreign nations, he believed, however, would in future have too much wisdom, if not too much goodness, to attack us; and there was no occasion to keep up a regular military force for defensive purposes. He was in favor of increasing the Navy, to a certain extent, but opposed to a large military force.

Mr. CUTHBERT said, there could be no doubt, he thought, that in the regulation of our Military Establishment, there should be some mean number to which it ought to be reduced. To reduce it as low as was proposed, would be as unwise, in his view, as not to reduce it at all. The reasons in favor of the proposed reduction, were not strong enough to balance the objections against it. In the first place, he argued, it was extremely important to know what the determination and spirit of the enemy is. In going into and coming out of a contest, it is all-important to know what is the spirit of your antagonist. Are you willing, said he, to tell your late enemy, you rejoice extremely in the peace, and are willing to rush at once into extreme tranquillity? If you persuade him that the people were so anxious for the return of peace, that they would therefore sacrifice everything, you encourage him to commit future aggressions. He adverted to the influence of such precipitation on our own people, and deprecated it as declaring peace and tranquillity too much, and relaxing their spirits so greatly, that it would be with great difficulty, in case of future wars being forced on us, they could be induced to make the necessary sacrifices. Militia, he said, however to be depended on, were not calculated for garrison duty, which they abhorred and revolted from, and which could only properly be performed by regular troops. Neither were militia fit to contest a regular campaign, with an enemy in a fixed seat of war—such a campaign, for instance, as that of the last Summer on the Canadian frontier. Would you, said he, for such a service depend on militia force, serving for six months, and continually changing at the end of that term, or on a regular force, competent to meet in the open field, and to manœuvre against a regular army? While no one more highly than him appreciated the enthusiasm which militia had displayed in occasional service, he denied their capacity to sustain an equal conflict with regular troops in a regular campaign. On the other hand, Mr. C. said, he would by no means go into a large Military Establishment, in time of peace. The party to which he belonged had always been averse to heaping unnecessary burdens on the people; and the lightness of the burdens imposed on them, was what had induced them always to adhere to and support the Government as they had done throughout the war. He would not weaken that attachment, which, in the moment of danger, became a principle of energy and action. Ten thousand men, he said, for a time of trouble, were not too few, and for the present time, he thought, would be a proper force. In time of actual war, they would serve as a foundation, and a foundation only did we ever want, for a good army.

Mr. STUART said he had intended to have given a silent vote in favor of the largest number of men proposed; and, notwithstanding the arguments urged against the number of ten thousand men, he still adhered to his own opinion, that ten thousand men would not be too many. It was much easier to disband than to raise an army; and, while we have some of the best troops in the world, let us not disband too many of them. The difference of expense between six and ten thousand men for a few months, would be trifling. At the next session, if we had peace with every nation on that firm basis he hoped we should have, he would join with gentlemen in reducing the Army still lower. Ten thousand men, he said, he wished to retain, neither as a Peace or War Establishment, but as constituting such a force as the times required. He voted for this number, not entirely because a large force had been recommended by the Executive, but on his own opinion, deliberately and maturely formed; and, although the gentleman who had moved in the Committee to strike out ten thousand, appeared to hope it would be carried by a large majority, Mr. S. said he hoped the contrary. Mr. S. said he would pin his faith on no man's sleeve, in or out of this House; but he thought we had no right to expect to keep entirely clear of all hostility, and under present circumstances he could not consent to reduce the Army as low as was proposed.

Military Peace Establishment.

FEBRUARY, 1815.

Mr. POTTER said he had been in hopes, until the debate of to-day, that we had made peace in the spirit of peace, and that the Army would have been reduced to the Peace Establishment. The people of the United States had suffered very great privations, and it was time they should be relieved. Mr. P. said he had some little knowledge of different Administrations for twenty years past, and so far as he knew them, it had always been a good time to continue or increase the burdens on the people and to multiply offices; but, under no Administration did he ever know it a good and proper time to begin the reduction of expenses and abolition of offices. He had been in hopes, he said, that gentlemen who have the management of the affairs of Administration, and had professed great Republicanism, would have shown a willingness, when they had the power, to practice what they had preached. The argument that we must support an army because the British have men in Canada, is entitled to no weight. If we are to support thirty thousand men on that ground, we need no war to destroy the Administration and beggar the people; we had better be in war, indeed, than in such a peace as that. Another gentleman was afraid of reducing the Army lest Britain should suppose we were heartily tired of the war and could not bear the burdens of it. This argument he treated as absurd—punishing ourselves to no purpose. In regard to the different calculations as to the expense of a military force, he said it was probable they were all underrated; that the calculation of the expense of an army was something like that of building a house; when you have made your estimate, you ought to double the estimate, which will then fall short of the actual expense. By all the direct and internal taxes, he said, the Government had not yet collected from the people five millions of dollars. The army proposed to be retained would cost more per year than had been actually collected from the people during the late war. We ought, he said, now to look forward, and not to look back; there had been more irritation and talking about “the enemy” to-day than there had been for almost a year during the war. Mr. P. made a few other remarks, going to show that the burdens on the people ought to be reduced as soon as possible, which would only be accomplished by an adequate reduction of the Army.

Mr. CALHOUN was more and more convinced of the inexpediency of breaking up at once our whole Military Establishment. Had they before them, he asked, or could they have at this session, the necessary estimates whereon to fix the Peace Establishment? If they had, there would probably be little difference of opinion on the subject; but they had not. Gentlemen had said, that to retain so great a force would imply a suspicion of the good faith of Great Britain in regard to the peace. His reply to that argument was, that, if the largest number now proposed be agreed to, we shall reduce our army to one-sixth of the amount of our War Establishment; that is to say, from sixty to ten thousand men, and ultimately perhaps from ten thousand to six. He rose now, however, principally to reply to the argument that our ratification of the Treaty of Peace amounted to an abandonment to Great Britain of the right of impressment, &c.; to an abandonment of “free trade and sailors’ rights.” In the first place, he denied the position that this country had ever set up a claim to the immunity of the flag. We had always been ready to make any arrangement by which our own seamen should be protected. Although the Government perhaps ought to have done so, it never made it a point, that the flag should protect everything under it. It had said, however, that unless the flag did protect all sailing under it, it would be difficult to remedy the abuse of the search for persons. We offered the rule that the flag should protect the seamen, as one subject to modification. This Government had always been willing to make such reciprocal regulations as should in this respect secure to each nation its rights. The celebrated seamen’s bill, as it was generally called, was the result of a disposition of this sort. We have denied the right of Great Britain to take any other than her own seamen; and have we made any stipulation, express or implied, by which we yielded the right of our citizens to exemption from impressment by her authority? On the contrary, said Mr. C., I maintain that that right is substantially and forever fixed. We have exhibited, during this war, a power and an energy of character which will prevent any Power from hereafter finding it expedient to take our or any other seamen from our decks.

Mr. C. added, he had no doubt but Great Britain would be willing to guard against future collision on that subject, to enter into reciprocal arrangements which shall preclude hereafter any necessity or pretence for searching our merchant vessels for her seamen. There is no abandonment on our part, by the treaty, of any right. He had seen assertions to the contrary in newspapers; but he never expected to have heard it gravely said on this floor, that it would be something like a violation of the treaty if we should hereafter resist the practice of impressment of our seamen. The war, Mr. C. said, had effected all its great objects. The British claim of impressment, which we resisted, ended with the European war. It was a claim resulting from a state of war. That state ceasing, the operation of the claim ceased, and there was no necessity for a treaty stipulation against a claim which was extinct. If war should again break out in Europe, and that claim be revived, (which he believed it would not,) we shall be in a better condition than ever to assert the rights of our citizens; though, he believed, we have made such an impression on the British nation, that it will never feel the same disposition hereafter that it has formerly evinced to encroach on our rights, which are now better secured than by paper or parchment stipulations. They are secured and settled by the vigor and energy of the American people, who will again be ready to draw the sword if Britain again encroaches on our dearest rights.

Military Peace Establishment.

H. OF R.

Mr. HANSON, of Maryland, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, it is because I am unwilling to consume much of the precious time of the House, at this late period of the session, that I rise with reluctance to reply to the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN.) The Constitutional day for terminating the deliberations of this body is at hand; and a discussion, involving a question of such magnitude as the Treaty of Peace, cannot be disposed of in the manner which all parties would desire.

The reluctance I have expressed, is not meant as mere matter of form, by way of exordium. It is sincerely felt. But in avowing it, I must not be suspected of any disposition, from personal or political motives, to avoid a discussion, which the honorable gentleman appears to seek. I rejoiced with all my heart at the restoration of peace, and I should now rejoice at such a discussion of the provisions of the treaty as sooner or later must take place. Could I have my choice, I would choose this day for the discussion. I feel every disposition to communicate to my constituents the reflections naturally arising out of the new state of things which exists. When the proper moment does arrive, and the House consents to take up this question for full discussion, I shall hold myself in readiness to engage in it with the solemnity it requires, and to the extent of which I may be capable. It will still depend very much upon the prudence and discretion of gentlemen in the majority, whether the few remaining days of the session will be consumed in a debate, which by no means promises to be a very profitable one to them.

Already has the gentleman from South Carolina said enough to justify the few remarks I propose to offer in reply to his extraordinary assertions, and the strange and unexpected positions he has ventured to lay down.

Before I enter upon the execution of the task I have assigned myself, it will be proper to notice, as first in order, the particular question of reducing the Military Establishment to the standard proposed, six thousand men. On this subject, I entirely concur in the opinion expressed by my friend next to me, (Mr. GROSVENOR.) I agree with him, that it would be contrary to the dictates of prudence, and the best maxims of wisdom, regarded by all provident and well regulated Governments, to disarm the country in the present state of its affairs. I agree in the statesmanlike view he has concisely and eloquently taken of this subject. It would undoubtedly be impolitic and unsafe to cut down our Military Establishment to the peace standard, before Great Britain had complied with the provisions of the treaty, and restored the important military posts she now occupies within our territory. I am happy to find that opinion confirmed and corroborated by my experienced and worthy colleague who sits near me, (Mr. STUART.) He has given his opinion also, to the House, in the language of a soldier and a statesman, uninfluenced by those little party feelings which sometimes sway the most independent minds, and warp the strongest judgments.

In the vote I am prepared to give upon the proposed reduction of the Army, I am governed not at all by an apprehension that Great Britain is disposed to violate the treaty, or in bad faith to create any difficulties or delay in withdrawing her troops from our territory. But is it the part of a prudent and wise Government to repose entirely for its safety upon the honor and good faith of nations? While an inch of our territory is occupied by foreign troops, I can never consent to lay down our arms. It would be taking upon myself a responsibility which I could neither justify to my own conscience, my constituents, or my country. Certainly, I do not contemplate imposing upon the people the burden of a Military War Establishment in a time of peace. I know my duty, and understand the feelings of the people too well to contract the danger of a political error so unpardonable. I entertain no such design. All I ask is, that Fort Niagara be restored, that Castine be evacuated, before I will give my vote to reduce the Army below ten thousand men. The present War Establishment, authorized by law, exceeds sixty thousand men. I am ready at once to lop off five-sixths of the Army. I join gentlemen in voting to-day to dismiss fifty thousand; but further I cannot go consistently with my ideas of prudence, and a just sense of the obligations imposed upon me by my situation. On our Northern border, the late enemy presents a formidable force. From the best information, he is twenty thousand strong, with at least five thousand well disciplined militia co-operating with this powerful veteran army. Will the people agree, would it comport with the dignity and character of a Government deserving the respect of foreign nations, and the confidence of its own people, entirely to disarm itself immediately upon the ratification of a treaty, and under circumstances known to exist in this country? We first catch at the treaty with the ravenous avidity of a condemned malefactor accepting a reprieve with a halter around his neck. It is ratified almost without deliberation, as though it were predetermined to take it, "sight unseen," be its provisions ever so humiliating and derogatory to an independent nation. Then we disband our Army, strip ourselves of all defence, while foreign troops are still in the occupation of important military posts. Is this the conduct to be looked for from an exalted Government, intrusted with the conservatory power of a free and high minded people? What can be more unwise, more undignified? What better calculated to draw down on both the contempt and derision of foreign nations? Our national character may already be sunk extremely low, but the popular course, as it is deemed, proposed now to be pursued, will sink it still lower—lower than the bitterest enemy of the Administration can desire to see it sunk.

I stand not here, sir, the supporter of large standing armies in time of peace. But unpopular as the vote may be considered, I am ready to encounter the odium of preserving a commanding attitude, until the relations of peace are perfectly restored, and each party reassumes its posture before the war. I will not allow myself to doubt, for a moment, what would be the determination of the minority if the reins of Government were in their hands, and they were responsible for the character and safety of the country. I have only to refer to their known principles, and the political maxims by which they have always been governed, to pronounce the policy which would prevail at such a moment and under existing circumstances.

My honorable friend before me, (Mr. Stockton,) upon whose opinion I am in the habit of relying almost implicitly, from his known strength of judgment, purity, and disinterestedness, acknowledges himself to be influenced by the threatening declarations of some gentlemen over the way, who look to a renewal of hostilities with England. He says, he is alarmed by declarations of the kind, proceeding from such high authority. For my part, sir, I am influenced by no such feelings. There is nothing in these warlike menaces which at all disturbs my mind. The honorable gentleman attaches too much importance to the airy, inconsiderate, idle declarations that proceed from some gentlemen, who fancy themselves as filling, on this floor, the stations of Lords Castlereagh and Liverpool, or the Chancellor in the British Parliament. So far from seeing in this vamping declamation real cause of alarm, to use a vulgar figure, I should just as soon expect a scalded cat to jump into a cauldron of boiling water as to suspect this Administration of a design to plunge the country into another war with England. The gentleman from New Jersey may rest assured the intentions of the majority are quite as innocent as their declarations. An individual who has got disgracefully out of a quarrel, may, in charity, be allowed the consolation and relief to be derived from a courageous threat to renew the conflict. In private life, these instances are quite common, and they generally end with the threat. I will abstain from the remarks which belong to this subject, and proceed to reply to the gentleman from South Carolina.

I begin, sir, by acknowledging myself to be entirely at a loss for the proper language in which to express my amazement at the principles he has laid down, and the positions he has taken. In these, not all the gentleman's ingenuity, great as it is known and admitted to be, can sustain him.

He says, we have neither abandoned nor impaired any claim for which the war was declared, by accepting a treaty which is silent as to those claims. He contends that the question of impressment, as a claim, remains where it was before the war. With his accustomed confidence and boldness, he asserts that the claim of this Government was the protection of its own seamen; and he denies, unequivocally, that we ever contended for "the immunity of our flag," while the British set up the right to impress our seamen.

The gentleman's first position involves an important principle of public law. If there were any variance among the most approved writers on the law of nations on this point, still it is in my power to refer to the high authority of the gentleman himself to settle the question between us.

The position I contend for is this: Impressment being assigned as a principal cause of war, both in the Message of the President recommending war, and the celebrated manifesto promulgated by the Committee of Foreign Relations, and a Treaty of Peace having been ratified, in which no provision whatever is made for this claim, it is ipso facto abandoned, and war cannot be renewed for the same cause. The broad principle laid down by Vattel, and controverted by no public writer, supports my position. "A Treaty of Peace," says this writer, "abolishes the subject of the war, and prohibits the taking up arms again for the same cause." As far, then, as impressment was a cause of war, it is abolished by the Treaty of Peace, and we are precluded by our own act from taking up arms again for the same cause. But the gentleman repels this principle of public law with disdain. He is still resolved never to relinquish the claim of impressment. He will cling to it because of its justice, and because the law is on his side.

Upon the question of law, the gentleman's opinion has undergone a material change since the year 1813. I have fortunately found, on the records of the House, the gentleman's opinion in writing, drawn up after mature deliberation, and gravely pronounced by him in a report, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. The position assumed in this report was recognised and adopted by the House, being laid on the table and ordered to be printed. It is now matter of record; and, from that record, the passage I propose to read is in the following words:

"The impressment of our seamen being deservedly considered a principal cause of the war, the war ought to be prosecuted until that cause is removed. To appeal to arms in defence of a right, and to lay them down without securing it, or a satisfactory evidence of a good disposition in the opposite party to secure it, would be considered in no other light than a relinquishment of it. To attempt to negotiate afterwards for the security of such right, in the expectation that any of the arguments that had been urged before the declaration of war, and been rejected, would have more weight after that experiment had been made in vain, would be an act of folly, which would expose us to the scorn and derision of the British nation and the whole world."

In defence of their pretension upon this question of impressment, the party in power appealed to arms; and I call on them to deny, if they can, that they have laid down their arms without securing the right contended for. According to their own view of the subject, as set forth in the report of their committee, have they not relinquished the claim? It is not a circumstance too trivial to repeat, that the gentleman who now finds it convenient to deny and combat the doctrines and principles contained in the report of the committee, was himself chairman of that committee. Unless, as is frequently the case with these chairman of standing committees, he acted as the mere amanuensis or scribe of the Executive, the report proceeded from his own pen. It is at least excusable, therefore, thus to brush up the gentleman's recollection, by referring to his former opinions. His memory must be exceedingly treacherous, to require any correction upon a point so material, and on which he had so lately given a grave opinion.

Does the gentleman deny that he was the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations when this report was made to the House? From his silence, we must infer this point at least is conceded. If it were not, the Journal of the House is at hand, and would as readily settle this difference as the report itself settled the other point in dispute. Nor does the gentleman deny that the extract read contains the opinion entertained by him, at the time the report was made. The difficulty and embarrassment of the gentleman's situation must occur to him, as it is certainly obvious to the House. Is it not manifest that he was guilty, at the time of making the famous war report, of imposing false principles of public law upon the credulity of his supporters; or he now renounces and abjures his own sound doctrines because it is convenient, party purposes requiring it? The gentleman's situation is by no means enviable. Take which alternative he may, there stands the difficulty staring him in the face. Turn which way he will, his difficulty fronts him. It is his own fault, not mine, that his embarrassment is such as I have described.

I contend, sir, that the gentleman's opinion, as deliberately formed, and gravely expressed, in 1813, is more to be respected than a contradictory opinion now hastily pronounced in debate, when he finds himself rather closely pressed in argument, and is disposed to extricate himself in the readiest way he can. A denial or a round assertion is the usual recourse of some gentlemen, when reduced to such straight. Custom may familiarize the practice, and make it venial in the vulgar estimate, but I neither choose to be guilty of it myself, nor overlook it when resorted to by others.

I trust, sir, the gentleman's first position is disposed of to the satisfaction of the House. I proceed to notice his second, to wit, "that we did not take up arms to secure the immunity of our flag, but to defend our own seamen." Here again I have occasion to correct the gentleman's memory. I must refer him to an extract or two, from the public documents, which I have fortunately laid my hands on since the gentleman took the floor. In the letter of instructions sent to our Ministers, appointed to negotiate under the mediation of Russia, dated April 15th, 1813, he may find this passage: "I have to repeat, that the great object you have to secure, in regard to impressment, is that the flag shall protect the crew."

What other meaning can the ingenious gentleman attach to this instruction, than the securing the immunity of our flag, as relates to the crew? The flag was to protect all the crew, consist it of British subjects, deserters, or who not. Our claim then went beyond the protection of our own seamen. It extended to the whole crew, whether enemies or British deserters. The gentleman will concede this point, unless his own authority is considered higher than the Secretary of State's.

The same instruction referred to is still more explicit, in another part of it, upon the same point. Mr. Monroe continues, "your first duty is 'to conclude a peace with Great Britain; and 'you are authorized to do it, in case you obtain a 'satisfactory stipulation against impressment—'one which will secure, under our flag, protection 'to the crew.'"

Language cannot be plainer. Provided a stipulation can be obtained by which the crew of our merchant vessels, of whatever description, shall be protected from impressment, you may conclude a peace, but not otherwise. To say nothing of making our claim upon the subject of impressment a sine qua non, and then abandoning it, (for it is not my present purpose to take that view of the question,) what other meaning can be given to this instruction, but that our flag should be free and inviolate as regarded the crew.

In a subsequent instruction to our Ministers at Gottenburg, of 28th January, 1814, Mr. Monroe says: "On impressment, as to the right of the 'United States to be exempted from it, I have 'nothing new to add. The sentiments of the 'President have undergone no change on that 'important subject. This degrading practice must 'cease. Our flag must protect the crew, or the 'United States cannot consider themselves an 'independent nation.'"

Yet the gentleman says, we went not to war for the immunity of our flag; all we contended for, was the protection under our flag of American seamen. It would really appear as if the gentleman was totally ignorant of the correspondence with our Ministers abroad, and with foreign Governments, or if he ever read the public documents, that he has entirely forgotten them. It is impossible, otherwise he would have ventured on such an assertion, being aware of the facility with which he could be answered.

To place in a still clearer light, if possible, the claim of our Government, I must refer again to documentary evidence. In a letter to Lord Castlereagh, dated 24th August, 1812, Mr. Russell states his authority to stipulate an armistice with Great Britain, "on condition that the Orders in 'Council be repealed, and no illegal blockades be 'substituted to them, and that orders be immediately given to discontinue the impressment of 'persons from American vessels, and to restore 'the citizens of the United States already im-'pressed."

In other words, the United States is to be exempted from impressment. All "persons," enemies of the belligerent, British deserters, fugitives from justice, traitors, or no matter who, all persons were to be protected by our flag. The flag was to cover the crew.

The same ground is taken, in rejecting the armistice made by Governor Prevost and General Dearborn. The same ground is taken in refusing to make an armistice with Admiral Warren; and, until to-day, I never heard it denied that the pretension set up by this Administration and its supporters was what I have proved it to be. To do full justice to the subject, it would be necessary to consult the documents as far back as the negotiation between Mr. Monroe and Lords Auckland and Holland.

The gentleman has also contended, that the British claim of impressment was to take American seamen, and that the resistance of this usurpation and outrage constituted the strength and justice of our cause. I deny, sir, that any such claim was ever set up by Great Britain; and I do not propose to meet the assertion by a bare denial on my own part, or on the part of Great Britain, who has repeatedly disclaimed any such pretension. I propose to meet it with an authority which this House will consider much higher than either. In a letter from Colonel Monroe to Admiral Warren, October 27th, 1812, I have found this passage, "The claim of the British Government is to take from the merchant vessels of other countries British subjects."

Without disgracing his office, and implicating the character of his Government for veracity, the Secretary of State could not allege that any other claim had ever been set up by Great Britain, but to seize her own subjects when found on board neutral vessels. That, in the exercise of this right of impressing her own subjects, great, shameful, and unsufferable abuses were frequently committed, is not disputed and was never denied. But what I aim to establish is, that the British claim never went beyond the impressment of the subjects of Great Britain. Our claim was to protect British subjects sailing under our flag. We identified the dearest rights of the people and the national independence with this claim. "The flag must protect the crew, or the United States cannot consider themselves an independent nation." Our very independence is staked for the protection of foreign fugitives. The issue was predicted. It is now matter of history.

I flatter myself it has been shown, from authority to which the honorable gentleman will bow, that his notions about the opposite claims of the two countries are altogether fanciful and erroneous. I have before established, upon his own authority, that a Treaty of Peace which does not secure the right for which the war was declared, operates its abandonment, or to use his own words, its "relinquishment."

Knowing the general desire of the House to postpone to the next session an inquiry into the loss and gain by the war, and the provisions of the Treaty of Peace, I shall not cross its wishes by commencing the discussion. The extraordinary course taken in debate by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, required at least as much as I have said. I would have him know, that I am not desirous of avoiding a full discussion of the treaty and all the topics connected with it. If there are but few on either side of the House who think the discussion should be brought on this session, and gone through thoroughly, I am one of the few who thought from the first, and still think, it should take place if possible. The people look for it; they have a right to expect it. I am anxious to gratify them. For allow me to say on this question, the Executive is vulnerable at every point. An inveterate opponent of the Administration would select this as the choicest opportunity to gratify the most splenetic resentment against them. Therefore, on this side of the House no suspicion will be cast, certainly, by the gentleman, of an unwillingness to meet the question in any shape and at any time.

Before I sit down, sir, I beg leave to express the deep concern I feel at differing with so large a majority of my political friends. Conscious rectitude, and a perfect conviction of the correctness of the view which mature reflection has given the subject to my mind, has left me no choice but to separate in the present vote. The more I examine the question, the more confirmed am I in the opinion that it would be undignified, unwise, and unsafe to disarm the country before the foreign troops are withdrawn from our territory. Instead of presuming entirely upon the good faith of any nation, it is the part of a provident, wise, and well regulated Government to act upon the contrary presumption. I agree with gentlemen, the country is much exhausted, and a system of rigid economy and frugality will be necessary to recover and invigorate its resources. Our means have been squandered, shamefully wasted, to a degree exciting very just anxiety and alarm, but I still hope we are not reduced so low that a respectable force cannot be maintained for a few months more, until our territory shall have been cleared of foreign troops, and the military posts in his possession restored. Not, sir, that I seriously apprehend any difficulty in the fulfilment in good faith, by both parties, of all the provisions of the treaty; but I am compelled to vote in the present case as I would were my friends in power, and responsible for the due administration of the Government, and the safety of the country. I consider the majority, in this instance, as acting according to the wisest political maxims, and upon Federal principles. I will not, therefore, vote against the measure because it is their measure. I will not enter the lists in a race for popularity, in opposition to what may be the best interests of the country. My friends will engage in no such contest. It is to be feared, however, that the votes of many of the majority, who have declared in favor of disarming the country at once, are influenced by a desire to propitiate popular favor. But it must be the better opinion, that the wise and reflecting portion of the people will prefer our preserving a respectable state of defence until all danger has disappeared. They will consider the slight additional expense of maintaining a few thousand troops, more than necessary in a time of peace, as nothing compared with the enormous burdens which a continuance or a renewal of the war would render necessary. In the other branch of the Legislature, I learn with pleasure there prevails an unusual unanimity in favor of the course I have presumed to defend. I entertain a hope it will be the course adopted. It has prudence and dignity on its side; it has the example of all nations on its side. For there never was an instance of a wise and well regulated Government laying down its arms immediately on the ratification of a Treaty of Peace, under the circumstances described and known to exist in the present case. I hope the blank will be filled with at least ten thousand men.

Mr. CALHOUN again rose. Nothing, he said, was more easy, than by taking detached parts of papers, and omitting to take circumstances into view, entirely to misrepresent any question. If the gentleman last up, who had quoted a part of the instructions to our Ministers, had read a little more of that report, he would have perceived the gross error of the construction he had put upon it; for he would have found that our Ministers were authorized to have made a treaty, containing a stipulation respecting impressment, to terminate at the conclusion of a peace in Europe; the object being to guard against the possible continuance of the practice of impressment during the war in Europe. He would have further seen, that the necessity for such a stipulation ceased. What, said Mr. C., was the injury which we complained of, and what was the claim of the enemy? The claim of the enemy was, that he had a right, in time of war, to enter on board American (neutral) vessels, and to judge who were American and who British seamen, and to take therefrom whomsoever he thought proper. What was the ground of complaint on our side? That the enemy, in the exercise of this pretended right, frequently took American seamen, to the detriment of the commerce, and deprivation of the personal liberty of American citizens. At the time those instructions were expedited to our Ministers there was a war raging in Europe, which no gentleman then pretended to think would come to a termination in many years. It appeared to be a contest which would endure for a series of years, having already, with little intermission, lasted twenty years. Those statements, and those instructions, a part of which had been quoted, were then given, respecting the question of impressment, as springing out of a state of war; and it was at that time the report was made to this House, proclaiming the necessity of unceasing resistance of so grievous an injury. That state of war, Mr. C. continued, having ceased, and with it the evil of impressment, there was no necessity to continue the war on that account; and, had we continued the war on that account, what then would have been the language of the gentleman and his friends? That statesmen go to war for practical injuries; that, as Great Britain never impresses in time of peace in Europe, in the present state of things to have continued the war on that ground, would have been fighting to resist a speculative claim, on the part of the British Government, which in practice had ceased. To have done so would have been unwise, and would have met the severest reprobation of the gentlemen on that side of the House. Everybody who heard him knew, Mr. C. said, that such would have been the clamor rung from one end of the country to the other. Any one who adverted to the very document, of which the gentleman had read a part, would find his whole argument answered by it, (taking in connexion with it the circumstances of the world,) as completely and demonstrably as any proposition in Euclid. The idea that we had relinquished our right in this respect, because it was not recited in the Treaty, was, in his opinion, preposterous. It could not be maintained by the semblance of an argument. It is not at all affected by it, unless that it is fortified by the events of the present war, and the spirit with which it has been waged, which will probably make foreign Powers more careful of invading our rights. The benefit of the claim to Britain can never compensate for the injury she might sustain by provoking us to war in resistance of it, and in defence of the personal liberty of the citizens. In the late war this nation has acquired a character which will secure respect to its rights. If ever an American citizen should be forcibly impressed, Mr. C. said, he should be ready again to draw the sword in his defence; and no Government could prosper that would, with impunity, permit such a damnable violation of the personal rights of its citizens. Government itself is only protection; and they cannot be separated. I feel pleasure and pride, said Mr. C., in being able to say, that I am of a party which drew the sword on this question, and succeeded in the contest; for, to all practical purposes, we have achieved complete success.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I regret to consume, on this subject, even a few moments of the remainder of the session; so pressing and important is the business which ought to engage our attention. But it does appear to me, that in the wide range which gentlemen have taken, they have lost sight of the object and provisions of the bill. It is to fix the Military Peace Establishment of the United States, and has no relation to our connexion with foreign nations, or even to the position and intentions of our late enemy. All arguments, therefore, drawn from these considerations, or sources, are entirely out of place. But suppose further danger was to be apprehended from your late enemy, or from Spain, or any other Power, does not the fifth section of the bill leave it discretionary with the President, whether to disband your regular army, on the first day of April next, or not? Should circumstances render it necessary, in his opinion, you give him the power, however improperly, to retain the whole of your present army. And there can be no doubt of his disposition to do it, whether warranted by circumstances or not. The power of wielding sixty thousand swords, or of turning sixty thousand bayonets against his foreign or domestic foes, possesses infinite charms for him, and the patronage which they confer is all-important, the vital principle, to him, and most profitable to his friends.

Sir, when I came to the House this morning and saw a flock of Executive birds, of ill omen, fluttering round the Hall, I expected a war breeze—I expected that Executive influence would be extended to the utmost to fix your Peace Establishment as high as possible. These ominous, ill-fated birds, are never on the wing but a storm, destructive of some important interest of the people, immediately follows. A regular force of six thousand men, nearly double the number of your former Peace Establishment, are as many as ought to be retained, for any and every beneficial purpose; indeed are more than can be intrusted with the present abusers of power, with safety to the people.

Mr. Speaker, on the subject of the peace, and the events and progress of the late war, relative to which so much has here been said, I would observe, that neither foreign nations, nor our own, will judge thereof by your harangues here, or even by the deceptive Message of your President. No, sir, they have read in your declaration of war the alleged causes thereof, and will look into the Treaty of Peace to see what you have gained—they will there see that not one of the objects for which you went to war, has been secured or obtained. That even the point of honor rests with your late enemy, with the possession of Moose Island. Your own Envoys having very wisely submitted to commissioners, whether a part of your own territory and inhabitants belong to you or not.

Administration should not deceive themselves by the enthusiastic expression of unbounded joy, on the return of the blessing of peace—a joy which has spread like lightning through our country, electrifying our citizens, and is echoed, and re-echoed, and echoed again, from Maine to Louisiana. Its peals are still heard, like remote thunder, in the extremes of our nation. It implies the severest censures on, and I devoutly hope and believe, will seal the doom of this worthless Administration. It is not in commendation of the terms of peace; because it burst forth spontaneously, before those terms were known. Yes, sir, it implies an utter detestation and abhorrence of your war; and of war men and war measures. Yes, sir, an abhorrence of a war, from which the survivors rejoice to have escaped with their lives, and with the miserable remnants of their property, before you had completed the ruin of your country.

But mistake me not, sir, most cordially do I unite with honorable gentlemen on this floor, and with all my fellow-citizens, in mutual congratulations on the return of peace; already our beloved country is saved from further danger and desolation—most cordially do I join with honorable gentlemen here, in voting thanks, and monuments, and swords, and medals, to the brave defenders of the country by sea or land; in wreathing for them the laurels of immortality; and in every other testimonial of national gratitude to those who have preserved America from the power and strength of our late enemy, and from the wickedness and folly of our rulers. But, sir, in all this, there is nothing to console the wicked Administration; unless, like the foolish bird, they decorate their disgraced body with the plumage of others. Notwithstanding the truth, others might presume from the language of gentlemen this day, that they had beaten their late enemy at all points, had indeed conquered him in the cabinet, and in the field, and had emerged from the horrors of this war, covered with glory. Yes, sir, that glory, like the all-extended mantle of charity, had covered the multitude of their political sins. But where are we to look for this glory? Is it mounted on the shoulders of your officers (who swarm our streets) in the pretty form of epaulettes, right and left; or in the ruins of your Capitol? In the heroic attacks of our warriors; or in the precipitate and disgraceful flight of your President, your Constitutional Commander-in-Chief, from the unfought field at Bladensburg? In the numerous and splendid victories of our gallant "ocean warriors;" or in the wreck of public credit, and in the loss of thirty thousand brave Americans, and of one hundred and fifty million of treasure, sacrificed in your late ruinous war. In these scenes we find no glory for the Administration.

Accompany me next, to the cottages of the poor, and to the palaces of those who once were rich, for your war, like pale Death, as described by the elegant Latin poet, "æquo pulsat pede pauperum tabernas reguinque turres." Yes, sir, war,

"With impartial fate, Knocks at the cottage and the palace gate."

Enter with me these dwellings of wretchedness; inquire of the ten thousand widows made such by your war, there found, if glory will compensate for the loss of everything dear to their hearts; ask the twice ten thousand fatherless children orphaned by your war, if glory will give them bread, when they cry therefor, or clothes when naked, or instruction or restore to them the endearing relation of father! No, sir, no; they are thrown destitute and helpless upon "the mercy of a rude world, which must forever hide them," and will be taught to lisp in curses, the name of Madison, and Madison's war. Follow me to your various encampments, visit with me your numerous fields of battle, and of blood, and cry glory, glory, over the mouldering remains of thirty thousand slaughtered, murdered American citizens, victims to your ambition and folly; and see if it will re-animate, and restore them to their country and their friends. No, sir, no—their accusing spirits have ascended to their God, and their blood will be required at your hands. Cry, glory, glory, to your destroyed public creditors, and see if it will drown their clamors, or satisfy their demands, or fill the empty vaults of your Treasury. If your glory can do none of these things, it is of no national importance, "'tis air, a mere 'scutcheon;" when weighed against our loss—the mere dust of the balance.

Sir, as to this peace—I fervently pray God, it may be perpetual! As to the treaty, whatever may be its terms, and I grant they are humiliating—since it is ratified—fulfil it with the most scrupulous good faith, extend to your late enemy a generous confidence, in advance; you will lose nothing by your magnanimity, though you may everything by your enmity and distrust; reduce your army immediately to the lowest Peace Establishment—the American people will not maintain a standing army, to gratify the pride and ambition of any man; curtail your enormous expenses, by the most rigid economy, and thus relieve the people from some of the grievous burdens, which your war, and your madness, and your folly, have imposed upon them. As to the fears pretended to be entertained by some of the majority, of further hostile designs, meditated by your late enemy, or by any other nation; they are in vain; against them, I will point to the brave yeomanry of our country, and be silent.

Mr. FORSYTH explained a remark which had not been correctly understood by the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. STOCKTON.) In calling the Treaty of Peace a suspension of hostilities, he had no allusion to the disposition or wishes of the American Government. This Government desires nothing but the peaceful enjoyment of its rights, and there is no danger of a resort to hostilities on our part if these are not invaded. It was in reference to the probable policy and intention of Great Britain, as indicated by the pretensions with which the negotiations at Ghent were commenced—the ungracious manner in which it was conducted, and its extraordinary termination, connected with the then recent expedition to the Mississippi. There was one circumstance, not yet brought into view, which deserved notice, as another proof of the spirit of that Government to this country: the choice of the Secretary of Legation at Ghent, and the bearing of the olive branch to the United States. The man of all others in the Empire of Britain, who was chosen to perform this office, was one who had smuggled himself out of the United States, in consequence of a criminal prosecution commenced, or about to be commenced against him for violating the laws of the country, by whose hospitality he was protected. No man can calmly examine all the circumstances under which it was made, without feeling that the coals of hostility are still red beneath this treaty. A single breath of pride, interest, or ambition, will rekindle the smothered fire, and this instrument will be reduced to ashes by its ascending flame. It is to guard against the possible, the probable danger, that he was opposed to this reduction, at least until the season of danger is past; it was to deprive pride, interest, and ambition, of the hope of gratification, that he wished the armor of defence and offence to be for a short time retained. Is the danger imaginary? Have these powerful incentives to human action ceased to produce their wonted effects? Pride and interest are still the master-springs of the movements of Britain. Her ambition is an adder always coiled, whose fiery eye is eternally fixed upon its object; who watches with incessant anxiety for the moment of fatal security, when she can strike her poisoned tooth into the bosom of the victim. The porcupine can live in security in community with the serpent; the unarmed stag dies by its venomous bite. To the course he wished pursued, he had heard but one objection—the expense; the necessity of lessening the public burdens, of diminishing the taxes, by which the people were ground to the earth. And this objection is urged before the taxes were felt or complained of. The people do not wish a diminution of these burdens, if it cannot be effected without endangering their country. They have been at all times more willing to pay the price of security and honor than we have been to ask it at their hands. He had hoped that the spirit of narrow calculation, falsely styled economy, whose contracted view was fixed upon present expense, and was incapable of enlarging it to permanent and eventual advantage, had been laid forever by the powerful exorcisms of reason and experience. It would seem, however, that it had been only lulled by the presence of a more powerful demon. Since the potent spell of necessity had been broken, the troubled spirit of petty calculation was again awakened to vex the counsels and destroy the best hopes of the country.

Mr. PICKERING made a few additional remarks. In regard to the inference drawn from the selection of the bearer of the treaty, he said that he was unacquainted with the fact to which the gentleman referred. Mr. Baker appeared to have been the sole Secretary of the Commissioners at Ghent; one of the several secretaries attached to our commission was selected to bring the treaty, and the secretary of that commission was very naturally selected by the British Government to bring the treaty, without particular reference to him personally. So that no argument whatever would fairly be drawn from that appointment.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, said that no one estimated more highly the value of time at this moment, and none more regretted than he did that the honorable gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. STOCKTON) had thought proper to throw the firebrand of discord into the House on this question; but Mr. J. said he could not, consistently with a sense of duty, refrain from answering some of the remarks which had been made. Mr. J. proceeded to reply to some of the arguments drawn from the documents; and expressed his astonishment that those should now object to the peace, because the treaty contained no stipulation against a renewal of the practice of impressment, who had been willing to withdraw the declaration of war before the practice had ceased. In regard to the treaty, he said, it could not be expected that a Treaty of Peace could contain all the stipulations necessary to be entered into between nations who had just terminated a war. The treaty of Mr. Jay, for instance, was little more than a supplement, not a substitute to the Treaty of Peace of 1783. In the case of the late peace in Europe, the Treaty of Paris contained merely a provision that there should be peace, and other questions of territory and right were reserved for further negotiation; which negotiation was in train at Vienna, where questions of the highest importance were now agitated between those nations who had been parties to the peace. If our treaty is silent on the subject of the fisheries, it is also silent on a question equally important to Britain as the fisheries are to us—the right to a free intercourse with our Indian tribes. The right of searching our vessels, to which is charged against the treaty that it contains no limitation, is a belligerent power merely; and in time of peace no pretension is set up to it on the part of the British. It had been said it was too late now to talk about blockades; nor was it necessary, Mr. J. said, when the practice of blockade had ceased; and no one pretended that the practice was justifiable on the ground of right or public law. Mr. J. demonstrated by facts and reasoning, that the United States had at all times been willing to conclude a treaty when the practice of impressment should cease on the part of the British. No right is yet ceded by the treaty; and every assertion to the contrary is incorrect. Mr. J. spoke at some length, and would have gone more fully into the subject but for the lateness of the hour.

Mr. STOCKTON spoke in explanation, and in support of his position, that the rights asserted by us, and not recognised in the treaty, were thereby yielded.

Mr. EPPES rose to reply to the position which had been laid down by Mr. STOCKTON, in regard to the common law, respecting treaties. If the war in Europe continued, and the practice of impressment also continued, at the time the treaty was concluded, the argument of the gentleman from New Jersey would have been irresistible. But the facts are the very reverse. Before the conclusion of the treaty the practice had ceased; it no longer had existence. The abandonment by the United States can in no way be construed to embrace any other practices and claims than those that are actually in existence. If the gentleman's position was correct, it applied with equal force to the opposite side of the question; and the gentleman would hardly contend that Britain has forever abandoned her right to blockade an enemy's port, or impress her own citizens during war. What, in fact, are the circumstances? Great Britain claimed a right to impress our seamen, and to establish illimitable blockades. We resisted both pretensions. In the mean time, before a peace, circumstances occur which make them both useless to her, and both are withdrawn by Great Britain. As the war was commenced by us to resist, and by Great Britain to enforce those pretensions, the conclusion, if any, irresistibly follows, that that and not this Government had abandoned its claims.

Mr. GROSVENOR said, en passant, that either he or the gentleman from Virginia had totally mistaken the principles of national law.

The question on the reduction was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

The residue of the said amendments of the Committee of the Whole were then again read, and concurred in by the House.

Mr. PICKERING moved further to amend the said bill, by inserting, after the word "that," where it first occurs in the second section, the words "such part of;" and, after the word "artillery," where it also first occurs in the said section, the words "as shall be retained in service;" which was determined in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. CANNON, further to amend the said bill by striking from the sixth section, the following words:

"And that there shall, moreover, be allowed and granted to every such officer, in consideration of services during the late war, the following donations in land, viz: to a Major General, 2,560 acres; to a Brigadier General, 1,920 acres; to each Colonel and Lieutenant Colonel, 1,280 acres; to each Major, 960 acres; to each Captain, 640 acres; to each Subaltern, 480 acres; and to the representatives of such officers as shall have fallen or died in the service, during the late war, the number of acres according to the rank they held respectively, at the time of their decease; to be designated, surveyed, and laid off, at the public expense."

And the question being taken thereon, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 54, nays 50, as follows:

So the land bounty was stricken out.

Mr. CANNON then moved to strike out the seventh section, which proposes to make a similar allowance to staff officers deranged in virtue of the act.

On this motion a warm debate commenced, and the House adjourned, after a sitting of nearly seven hours.

TUESDAY, February 28.

Mr. FISK, of New York, from the committee appointed on the subject, reported a bill to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress, (fixing it for the fourth Monday in May next.) The bill was twice read and committed.

The bill from the Senate to provide for exploring the Chesapeake Bay and its waters, for the purposes therein mentioned, was twice read and committed.

The bill from the Senate to provide for ascertaining and surveying the boundary lines fixed by the treaty with the Creek Indians, and for other purposes, was twice read and committed.

The bill from the Senate to repeal certain acts therein mentioned, was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The galleries of the House were then cleared, and its doors closed, and remained so for more than four hours. When the doors were again open, the House resumed the consideration of the bill fixing the

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. CANNON withdrew his motion, which was under consideration when the House yesterday adjourned.

A motion was made by Mr. ALSTON, to reconsider the vote for striking out the donation in land to officers who shall be discharged from service in consequence of this act, or to the representatives of such as have fallen.

After debate, the question of reconsideration was decided in the affirmative. For the consideration 64, against it 50, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Barbour, Bines, Bowen, Calhoun, Clopton, Comstock, Condict, Creighton, Cuthbert, Desha, Duvall, Eppes, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholsen, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, Leferts, Lowndes, McCoy, Moore, Nelson, Ormsby, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Sharp, Smith of Virginia, Stewart, Tannehill,

The question recurring on striking out the same part of the bill—

Mr. GASTON moved to amend the said sixth section so as to limit the donation to such of the discharged officers as have by name been thanked by Congress, or have been brevetted, or have been wounded during the war.—Negatived.

On motion of Mr. MACON, the donation to field officers was reduced—the Major Generals to 1280, Brigadiers General to 1120, Colonels to 960, and Majors to 800 acres each.

And the question to strike out the donation clause, thus amended, was negatived.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and the House adjourned at sundown, after a session of more than seven hours.

WEDNESDAY, March 1.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act for the better organization of the courts of the United States, within the State of New York;'" with amendments. And that they have passed "a resolution directing the manner of providing stationery, and procuring printing for the Senate and House of Representatives;" in which amendments and resolution, they ask the concurrence of this House.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky,

Resolved, That the following named persons, employed by the Doorkeeper to aid him in the execution of the duties of his office, to wit: Elexius Spalding, George N. Thomas, Isaac Phillips, Oswald Dunn, and George Cooper, be, and they are hereby, allowed two dollars per day during the present session, and four days thereafter, and Charles Brooks two dollars per day for his services.

Mr. MACON, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, made a report, stating their inability to investigate the subject to their satisfaction during the present session, the general business of which has been so urgent, and recommending the appointment of a committee on the subject, to sit during the recess.

The engrossed bill "to fix the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," was read a third time and passed; as also was the bill to rest more effectually in the State courts, and in the district courts of the United States, jurisdiction in the cases therein mentioned.

MARCH, 1815.

Mr. GASTON submitted for consideration the following resolution :

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to report to the next Congress a plan for establishing, with the co-operation of the States, a national road from Maine to Georgia, and from Milledgeville to New Orleans, inclusive, passing through the City of Washington, and, as far as may be practicable, through the seats of government, or principal towns in the Atlantic States.

A motion was made by Mr. RUEA, of Tennessee, to amend the same by adding to the end thereof the following :

"And from the City of Washington to the respective seats of government of the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio."

This motion was negatived, and the resolution agreed to as originally proposed.

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS,

The bill from the Senate to repeal certain acts therein mentioned (prohibitory and non-importation acts) having been reported by Mr. FORSYTH, of the Committee of Foreign Relations, without amendment, was ordered to a third reading, and was subsequently read a third time and passed.

Mr. FORSYTH also made the following report :

"The Committee of Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States recommending the passage of a law to exclude foreign seamen from employment in American vessels, report, that the present session of Congress necessarily terminating on the third day of March, there is not sufficient time to give this subject the deliberate examination its importance demands. They therefore recommend the following resolution :

Resolved, That the further consideration of the Message of the President of the United States respecting the exclusion of foreign seamen from employment in American vessels be postponed until the next session of Congress."

The report was read and concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill supplementary to the act for the better organization of the Courts of the United States, were read and concurred in.

The bill from the Senate to continue in force the act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes, was read a third time and passed.

The bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, was read a third time and passed.

The bill concerning invalid pensioners (the annual bill on the subject) passed through a Committee of the Whole, and after occupying considerable time of the House on proposed amendments thereto, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The resolutions from the Senate "relative to the distribution of the laws of the United States," were read the third time and passed.

The bill from the Senate, "concerning the Naval Establishment," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States for the year 1815, and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with amendments; which were read, and concurred in by the House.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, the bill was recommended to a Committee of the Whole, and the House again went into Committee of the Whole on the bill. The Committee rose and reported an additional amendment thereto, as follow :

"For purchasing horses for artillery, one hundred thousand dollars."

A motion was made by Mr. PICKERING, to amend the said amendment by striking out "one hundred thousand dollars," and inserting "fifty thousand dollars;" which was determined in the negative—yeas 49, nays 57, as follows :

YEAS—Messrs. Bard, Barnett, Bigelow, Bradbury, Brigham, Caperton, Cannon, Champion, Clopton, Cox, Crawford, Crouch, Culpeper, Davenport, Ely, Farrow, Geddes, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Hale, Hawes, Hungerford, Hulbert, Jackson of Rhode Island, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lovett, Lyle, Moseley, Oakley, Ormsby, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Ruggles, Sage, Sherwood, Slaymaker, Smith of Pennsylvania, Stanford, Strong, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Wilcox, and Winter.

The amendment was then concurred in by the House; and the bill ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

THURSDAY, March 2.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred a resolution instructing them to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for surveying certain lands designated in the resolution, made a report; which was read, and concurred in by the House, to wit: "That no appropriation is necessary."

Mr. EPPES from the same committee, reported a bill making additional appropriation for the service of the year 1815; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, the Committee of Ways and Means were discharged from the consideration of all the matters and things referred to them during the present session, and upon which they have not reported.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky; which was ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the messenger and office-keeper in the office of the Clerk of this House be allowed the same pay per day, during the sessions of Congress, and for four days thereafter, as is allowed to the messengers employed by the Doorkeeper, and that he be allowed at the rate of thirty dollars a month during a recess.

On motion of Mr. REED, the committee appointed on the 17th of March last, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, means of retrenchment and economy of reform in the general management, and of extension and efficiency in the Naval Establishment, may be practicable and expedient, were discharged from the reports and documents submitted to them, and the said reports and documents were referred to the Board of Navy Commissioners.

On motion of Mr. CREIGHTON,

Resolved, That there be allowed and paid, out of the contingent fund, to the person employed by the Doorkeeper of this House to superintend the post office kept for the use of the House, in addition to the allowance already made him, the sum of one dollar per day during the sessions of Congress, and for twenty days after an adjournment of Congress, and that the said allowance commence from the first day of the present session.

On motion of Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, the committee appointed on that part of the Message from the President of the United States, at the commencement of the present session, which relates to the militia, were discharged from a further consideration of the several matters referred to them, and upon which they have not reported.

An engrossed bill, making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1815, was read the third time, and passed.

Ordered, That Mr. FISK, of New York, and Mr. CULPEPER, be the committee on the part of this House to wait upon the President of the United States, and request that he recommend a day of thanksgiving to Almighty God for restoring to these United States the blessings of peace.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate concur in the amendments of this House to the bill "to increase the compensation of the Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate and House of Representatives, and of the Doorkeeper and Assistant Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives," with amendments; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Another message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill from this House, "to fix the compensations and increase the responsibility of the collectors of the direct tax and internal duties, and for other purposes connected with the collection thereof;" with amendments. They have also passed bills of the following titles: "An act for the relief of sundry persons in the service of the United States, in consequence of the destruction of their tools by fire at the Navy Yard;" and "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage;" in which amendments and bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill to authorize the discharge of Edward Martin from his imprisonment, passed through a Committee of the Whole, was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate further supplementary to the act for the settlement of the Yazoo claims, passed through a Committee of the Whole, was ordered to a third reading, and was read a third time and passed.

The House then sat a short time in conclave, and before the doors were opened, removed the injunction of secrecy from their proceedings.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of the mechanics who lost their tools by the destruction of the Navy Yard, was twice read and committed.

The amendment of the Senate, to the bill to define the duties, and fix the compensation of the collectors of the direct tax and internal duties, was agreed to, yeas 75. It goes to leave undefined the compensation after the first of January next, fixing it up to that time only.

PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. EPPES laid before the House a letter addressed to him, as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, by the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting to their consideration a proposition to provide for paying the interest and gradually reducing the stock debt which has been created during the late war; which was read, and ordered to be printed. The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 24, 1815.

SIR: I have the honor to submit to the consideration of the Committee of Ways and Means, a proposition to provide for paying the interest and gradually reducing the stock debt which has been created during the late war. It was my intention to have accompanied this communication with tables, illustrating, in detail, the operation of the Sinking Fund, as well as the effect of the present proposition; but various causes render the performance of this task impracticable before the adjournment of Congress, and I cannot do better than to refer to the report which was made by the Treasury Department to the House of Representatives on the 9th of April, 1808, exhibiting explanatory statements and notes of the public debt, its increase or decrease, from the 1st of January, 1791, to the 1st of January, 1808. I shall, therefore, confine my views to—First. The general state of the public debt before the war; Second. The general state of the public debt contracted since the war; and, Third. The particular provision to be now made for the last description of the public debt.

I. On the 31st December, 1814, the amount of the public debt created before the war may be estimated at $39,905,183 66, and it consisted of the following particulars:

1. Old six per cent. stock, the nominal amount being $17,250,871 09
Of which there had been reimbursed 12,879,283 78

Leaving due on the 31st day of December, 1814 - - - $4,371,587 31

2. Deferred six per centum stock, the nominal amount of which is - - $9,358,320 35

Of which there had been reimbursed - 3,971,148 36

Leaving due on the 31st day of December, 1814 - - - $5,387,171 99

3. Three per cent. stock - - - 16,158,177 34

4. Exchanged six per cent. stock under the act of 1812 - - - 2,984,746 72

5. Six per cent. stock of 1796 - - - 80,000 00

6. Louisiana six per cent. stock - - 10,923,500 00

Estimated amount of the whole of the public debt, contracted before the war, due on 31st December, 1814 - $39,905,183 66

Upon the principles and estimates of the Treasury Report of the 9th of April, 1808, it was computed:

1. That on the 1st of January, 1808, the public debt amounted to - - - $64,700,000 00

2. If, therefore, the amount of the public debt computed to be due on the 31st December, 1814, be deducted, to wit: - - - 39,905,183 66

The amount redeemed between the 1st of January, 1808, and the 31st day of December, 1814, may be estimated at - - - $24,794,816 34

The establishment of a Sinking Fund to redeem the principal of the public debt was coeval with the funding system of 1790, but the payment of the interest of the debt was not charged upon that fund until 1802. The amount of the public debt was increased during several of the years that intervened between January, 1791, and January, 1803, and the Sinking Fund was enriched at various periods by the assignment of additional revenues. The acts of the 8th of May, 1792, the 3d of March, 1795, the 29th of April, 1802, and the 10th of November, 1803, form, however, the principal basis of the present Sinking Fund, providing for the annual payment of the interest, as well as for the gradual redemption of the debt.

Under the authority of these acts of Congress, the Sinking Fund amounts to the sum of $8,000,000 annually, which at this time is supplied from the following sources:

1. From the interest on such parts of the public debt as have been reimbursed or paid off, and which, at present, amounts to the sum of - $1,969,577 64

2. From the net proceeds of the sales of public lands (exclusive of lands sold in the Mississippi Territory, which, as yet, belong to the State of Georgia,) estimated annually at the sum of - - - 800,000 00

3. From the proceeds of duties on imports and tonnage, to make the annual sum of $8,000,000 estimated at about - - - 5,230,422 35

$8,000,000 00

II. On the 31st December, 1814, the amount of the public debt created since the war, (independent of temporary loans and issues of Treasury notes,) may be estimated at - - - $49,780,322 13

And it consisted of the following particulars:

1. Six per cent. stock of 1812, being the eleven million loan - - - 7,710,000 00

2. Six per cent. stock of 1813, being the sixteen million loan - - 18,109,377 51

3. Six per cent. stock of 1813, being the sixteen million five hundred thousand loan - - - 8,498,583 50

4. Six per cent. stock of 1814, being the loan of ten millions, (part of the loan authorized for twenty-five millions) - - - 9,190,476 25

5. Six per cent. stock of 1814, being the loan of six millions, (part of the loan authorized for twenty-five millions) - - - 4,342,875 00

$48,580,312 26

But it is proper to bring into view here, the additional six per cent. stock, which will be created in consequence of contracts depending on the 31st of December, 1814, to be completed in 1815, to wit:

1. The committee of defence of Philadelphia contracted to loan $100,000, to fortify the island in the river Delaware called the Pea Patch, for six per cent. stock at par, which will be issued under the act of March, 1812 - - - $100,000 00

2. The corporation of New York contracted to advance money for fortifications, supplies, &c., at New York, on the terms of the six million loan, and the amount being liquidated, six per cent. stock has been ordered for - - - 1,100,009 87

Public Debt.

H. OF R.

There are, however, other contracts for loans, made through the medium of the War Department, which have been recognised at the Treasury to be paid in six per cent. stock, but which have not been so liquidated as to furnish a ground to estimate their amount.

The six per cent. stock, which was issued under the act of the 24th of March, 1814, amounting to $3,000,000, and sent to Europe, has not been, and probably will not be sold. It is, therefore, omitted in the present estimates.

Besides the funded debt above stated, there have been contracted debts to the amount of $19,002,800, upon temporary loans, and upon the issues of Treasury notes, consisting of the following particulars:

1. Temporary loans have been obtained under the act of March, 1812, (of which the sum of $500,000 became due in December, 1814, and remains unpaid; and of which $50,000 will be payable in the year 1817,) for	$550,000 00
2. Treasury notes had been issued or ordered on the 20th February, 1815
(1.) Payable on or before the 1st January, 1815, due and unpaid principal	2,799,200
(2.) Payable since the 1st of January, 1815, due and unpaid	620,00
(3.) Payable almost daily, from the 11th of March, to and including January 1, 1816	7,227,280
(4.) Payable from the 11th of January, to and including the 1st March, 1816	7,806,320
	<hr/> 18,452,800 00

Making floating public debt in temporary loans and issues of Treasury notes	19,002,800 00
To which add the amount of funded debt	<hr/> 49,780,322 13

And the whole ascertained amount of debt created during the war, is the sum of	<hr/> $68,783,122 13
--	-----------------------

The general claims for militia services and supplies, arising under the authority of the individual States, as well as of the United States, have been partially exhibited; but neither the principle of settlement, nor the amount of the claims, can at this time be stated.

III. In suggesting provisions to pay the interest and gradually to reduce the principal of the public debt, contracted since the declaration of war, the inconvenience, which has been introduced, by making the payment of the principal and interest of the Treasury notes a charge upon the Sinking Fund, is greatly to be lamented. The Treasury notes were in their design, and ought to be in their use, a species of circulating medium; but it is evident that a sinking fund of $8,000,000, could never supply the means of paying the prior claims, and, also, of discharging punctually the whole of the principal, as well as the interest, of annual issues of Treasury notes, amounting to eight or ten millions of dollars. It is indispensable, therefore, to the free and beneficial operation of the Sinking Fund, that it should be disengaged, as soon as possible, from this burden. The means of disengaging it are, 1st, by the payment of the Treasury notes out of the current revenue; or, 2d, by funding them upon reasonable terms, under the act by which it is proposed to authorize a loan for the service of the year 1815; and these means, it is believed, will be effectual.

The Sinking Fund, being thus emancipated from the Treasury note debt, would be sufficient, in 1815, for the interest and reimbursement of the stock created before the war; for the interest of the stock created since the war; and for the interest of the loan to be raised for the present year, either in money, or by converting the Treasury note debt into stock debt. Thus,

1. The Sinking Fund amounts to	$8,000,000 00
2. The interest and reimbursement of stocks created before the war, will require a sum of	3,452,775 46
3. The interest of the stocks created since the war (computed on the above sum of $49,780,322 13,) and including $7,968, payable for annuities, will require a sum of	2,994,787 32
4. The interest on the loan for 1815 (computed to average a half year's interest on the sum of $11,500,000 being the estimated amount of the Treasury notes, which may be converted into stocks) will require a sum of	345,000 00
5. But there must be added, the interest and principal of the temporary loans due and unpaid, which were obtained under the authority to borrow, granted by the act of the — March, 1812, amounting for 1815, to the sum of	533,000 00
	<hr/> 7,325,562 78
And would leave a surplus of	<hr/> $674,437 22

It appears, on this view of the Sinking Fund, (independent of the operation of the past year) that there will be a surplus of $674,437 22, to be further applied to the reduction of the principal, both of the old and the new public debt. But this can only now be done by purchases in the market.

The proposition to be, at this time, submitted to the consideration of the Committee of Ways and Means, in relation to the stock debt created since the war, involves the following points:

1. That provision be made for the payment, or for the funding, of the Treasury note debt, so as to relieve the Sinking Fund from that charge.

2. That the Sinking Fund be applied, in the first place, to the interest and reimbursement of the old six per cent. stock, according to the existing laws.

3. That the Sinking Fund be applied, in the second place, to the payment of the principal and interest of the temporary loans, obtained under the act of March, 1812.

H. OF R.

Loan Bill—Militia Claims.

MARCH, 1815.

4. That the Sinking Fund be applied, in the third place, to the payment of the interest accruing upon the stock debt created since the war.

5. That the annual surplus of the Sinking Fund, after satisfying the above objects, be applied to the purchase of the stock created since the war; and that the interest upon the stock annually purchased, be added, from time to time, to that appropriation, for the purpose of making new purchases.

After the present year, there is reason to presume, that the public revenue will considerably exceed the public expenditure, and, consequently, that the necessity of borrowing will cease. At that period, a more satisfactory view may be taken of the subject, than can be taken while the amount of the public debt remains, in some measure, unascertained; the operation and product of the new taxes, as well as of the impost upon the revival of commerce, are conjectural, and the legislative intentions, respecting a Peace Establishment, have not been declared.

Since, therefore, the existing Sinking Fund (being relieved, in the manner before intimated, from the encumbrance of the Treasury note debt) is already charged with the payment of the interest on the stock created since the war, and will be sufficient for that purpose, besides paying the interest, and the annual reimbursement of the stock created before the war, I respectfully propose, that no further step be taken during the present session of Congress, than to authorize the subscription of Treasury notes to the loan which is now under Legislative consideration, and to direct the surplus of the Sinking Fund to be applied to purchases of the stock created since the war, for the emolument of the fund. But it will be proper to confine the benefit of subscribing to the loan to such Treasury notes only as have been, or may be issued under the acts which render them a charge upon the Sinking Fund, namely, the acts of the 20th of June, 1812; of the 25th of February, 1813; and of the 4th of March, 1814; and the Secretary of the Treasury should be authorized to designate the notes to be received in subscription, from time to time, according to the date of the issues.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

J. W. EPPES, Esq., Chairman, &c.

LOAN BILL.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill authorizing a loan for the service of 1815; on the question to fill the blank for the amount of the loan.

Mr. EPPES expressed his regret that this bill had been delayed to so late a period of the session; a delay which had not arisen, however, from any neglect on the part of the Committee of Ways and Means, but from the pressure of other business. The loan necessary for the present year, was for the purpose of redeeming Treasury notes, charged on the Sinking Fund. Of these notes there would fall due, in the year 1815, eight millions and upwards, and in the month of March 1815, ten millions of dollars, being the whole amount now in circulation, viz: $18,452,000. The loan might be confined to the amount of notes payable within the present year, but as the notes due in 1816 may return to the Treasury as a part of the receipts for the present year, being receivable in payment of all debts due the United States, it had been thought better to authorize the loan for the whole amount. He therefore moved to fill the blank with the sum of $18,452,000. And the motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, two new sections were added to the bill, one to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to accept in payment of any loan such Treasury notes as have been actually issued and are by law chargeable on the Sinking Fund; the other to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be paid interest on Treasury notes which have fallen due and have not been paid for the want of funds, interest whereon has not of course since accrued.

The bill was reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

OFFICERS OF THE HOUSE.

The bill from the Senate to increase the compensation of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, being before a Committee of the Whole—

Mr. GASTON moved to amend the bill by inserting, also, the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SEYBERT moved to add, the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CULPEPER moved to add, the Assistant Doorkeeper of the same body.

All these motions were agreed to, and the bill was reported as amended. On proceeding to consider the report of the Committee—

Mr. BARNETT moved to postpone the bill indefinitely; but subsequently withdrew the motion.

Some discussion took place on the amendments, which were all adopted; and the bill, thus amended, was ordered to a third reading, and was passed.

MILITIA CLAIMS.

The order of the day being called for on the bill from the Senate to "authorize settlement and payment of certain claims for the services of the militia?"—

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, moved to postpone the consideration thereof indefinitely.

This motion gave rise to a very animated and rather acrimonious debate, embracing, beside the real question, the merits of the conduct of the Governors of Massachusetts and Connecticut, their doctrines as to the militia, and the general conduct of the Eastern States opposed to the Government. The debate lasted perhaps two hours; and the question on indefinite postponement being taken, was decided in the negative—yeas 63, nays 69, as follows:

On motion of Mr. Fisk, of New York, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

DUTIES ON TONNAGE &c.

The bill from the Senate, "further to provide for the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage," was read a first and second time. [This bill contains a number of provisions, applicable to violations of the revenue law, resembling the provisions of the bill lately passed for preventing intercourse with the enemy.]

Mr. Fisk, of Vermont, moved that the bill be read a third time.

Mr. STOCKTON moved that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

This motion gave rise to a warm debate in the course of which Messrs. STOCKTON, WILLIAM REED, GROSVENOR, and SHEFFEY, advocated the motion, and Messrs. FISK of Vermont, RHEA, WRIGHT, EPPES, ALSTON, and NEWTON, opposed it.

At this stage of the debate—on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the bill was ordered to lie on the table, with a view to take up the bill fixing the Military Peace Establishment.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," were read.

The first section of the said bill, as passed by this House, is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Military Peace Establishment of the United States shall consist of such proportions of artillery, infantry, and riflemen, not exceeding in the whole six thousand men, as the President of the United States shall judge proper, and that the Corps of Engineers, as at present established, be retained.

The Senate propose to amend the said first section by striking out the word "peace," and by striking out the word "six," and inserting the word "fifteen."

A division of the question on the said amendments was called for, when the question was taken on that part of the said amendments which proposes to strike out the word "peace," and was determined in the negative—yeas 33, nays 86, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bard, Calhoun, Crawford, Creighton, Duvall, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forsyth, Gourdin, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hanson, Hasbrouck, Hawkins, Humphreys, Irwin, Kershaw, Lowndes, McCoy, Moore, Newton, Oakley, Pleasants, Rich, Ringgold, Seybert, Taylor, Telfair, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Winter, and Yancey.

The question was then taken on concurring in that part of the said amendments which proposes to strike out the word "six," and to insert in lieu thereof the word "fifteen," and was also determined in the negative—yeas 18, nays 100, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bard, Duvall, Findley, Fisk of New York, Forsyth, Gourdin, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hanson, Hawkins, Irwin, Kershaw, Newton, Oakley, Ringgold, Seybert, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

NAYS—Messrs. The residue of the amendments of the Senate to the said bill were then again read, and disagreed to by the House.

further consideration of all matters and things referred to them during the present session, upon which they have not reported.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their amendments disagreed to by this House, to the bill fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States."

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, notifying that they insist on their amendments to the bill fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States: whereupon—

Resolved, That this House insist on their disagreement to the said amendments, and ask a conference upon the subject-matter thereof.

Ordered, That Mr. TROUP, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, and Mr. STUART, be the managers at the said conference, on the part of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate "to provide a library room, and for transporting the library lately purchased." The bill was reported to the House, read the third time, and passed.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making additional appropriations for the service of the year 1815. The bill was reported with an amendment thereto, which was concurred in by the House; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act concerning invalid pensioners," with amendments. The amendments, were read, and concurred in by the House.

The bill to authorize the payment for horses lost in the public service in the Northwestern army, and in the campaigns under Generals Jackson and Floyd, in the present war, was postponed indefinitely.

The bill from the Senate, "to allow a drawback on duties on spirits distilled, and on certain goods, wares, and merchandise, manufactured, within the United States, on the exportation thereof to any foreign port or place," was postponed indefinitely.

The bill to authorize the purchase of the vessels captured on Lake Champlain, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Bowie and Kurtz, and others, having been called up—

Mr. YANCEY moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill indefinitely, on the ground of want of time duly to act on the subject.

The motion was opposed by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH and Mr. PITKIN, but was decided in the affirmative.

The bill from the Senate to repeal the discriminating duties on imports and tonnage, on condition that reciprocal measures are adopted by foreign Governments, passed through a Committee of the Whole without debate, and was reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading, and was read a third time, passed by unanimous vote, and returned to the Senate.

The bill to authorize the Board of Commissioners of the Navy to appoint clerks, passed through a Committee of the Whole, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was accordingly read a third time, and passed.

The bill to provide for ascertaining and surveying the boundary lines fixed by the treaty with the Creek Indians, and for other purposes; the bill concerning the Navy Establishment; the bill for the relief of Charles Todd; the bill for the relief of the Eastern Branch Bridge Company, passed through Committees of the Whole, and were severally read a third time, and passed.

The bill to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress having been called for—

Mr. NELSON moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed indefinitely.

This motion was opposed by Mr. FISK, of New York, who enumerated the advantages to arise from an early session, and the propriety of Congress fixing the day, rather than that they should be called together by the Executive.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, spoke in support of the motion, and stated his belief that an extra session would not in any event be necessary. He expressed his hope that Congress, as well as the people, might be permitted to enjoy a little peace.

Mr. NELSON supported his motion on the grounds of the total absence of a necessity for an extra session, and that their constituents ought not to be taxed for such an object unnecessarily.

Other gentlemen also spoke against as well as in favor of the motion for postponement; which was decided in the affirmative, and the bill indefinitely postponed.

WEST POINT ACADEMY.

The bill from the Senate authorizing an appropriation for completing the public buildings at West Point for the Military Academy, being before a Committee of the Whole—

Mr. TROUP moved to add thereto two other sections, to stand as first and second sections, contemplating the establishment of two corps of engineers, precisely of the same character, number, &c., as the present corps of engineers, each of which to be stationed at points to be designated by the President for the location of two military academies.

Mr. FISK, of New York, opposed the amendment as being too important to be decided at this late period of the session, and because not necessarily connected with the present bill. He stated several objections to the amendment, which at once occurred to him.

To these objections Mr. TROUP replied, and enforced the expediency of the amendment; and he contended that a more favorable opportunity for the attainment of such an object could not again occur.

Mr. YANCEY opposed the amendment, and expressed no great friendship for the bill. His principal objection was not to the establishment of other schools, but that Congress ought to fix the location of these other schools.

Mr. TAYLOR also opposed the amendment, which, he said, instead of putting a graft upon a tree, was putting a tree upon the graft. He was only opposed to the amendment from the difficulty which would attend the adoption of such a provision in both Houses at this period of the session.

The amendment was negatived by a large majority; and the Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

Mr. YANCEY moved to postpone indefinitely the further consideration of the bill; which motion was opposed by Mr. FISK, of New York, and supported by Mr. ALSTON, but was negatived by a large majority.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time, and was accordingly read a third time, and passed.

THANKS TO THE SPEAKER.

Mr. FINDLEY moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be presented to LANGDON CHEVES, in testimony of their approbation of his conduct in discharge of the arduous and important duties assigned him whilst in the Chair.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and this vote having been announced, the SPEAKER addressed the House as follows:

"GENTLEMEN: I am very sensible of the honor you have done me by your vote; but I am much more deeply affected by the kindness of which it is an evidence—a kindness which has been uniform, and which alone could have sustained me in times and under circumstances of such unusual difficulty and embarrassment as those in which we have acted together. Almost the only qualification with which I took the Chair was a determination faithfully, impartially, and independently to do my duty; almost the only merit which I have been authorized to claim, while in it, has been that of a zealous endeavor to execute that determination. But you, in the partiality of your kindness, have bestowed on these poor pretensions the highest excellence. Real gratitude, gentlemen, is not eloquent; I can only say I thank you—affectionately and unfeignedly I thank you! May God bless you all, and restore you speedily and happily to your families and your homes!"

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. PICKERING submitted the following propositions of amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring therein, That the following articles be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as amendments to the Constitution of the United States, each of which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the said Constitution:

ARTICLE 1. Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States, which may be included within this Union, according to their respective number of free persons, including those bound to serve for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, and all other persons.

ART. 2. No new State shall be admitted into the Union by Congress, in virtue of the power granted by the Constitution, without the concurrence of two-thirds of both Houses.

ART. 3. Congress shall not have power to lay any embargo on the ships or vessels of the citizens of the United States in the ports or harbors thereof, for more than sixty days.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, moved to proceed to the consideration of the bill for the further security of the collection of duties on imports and tonnage.

Mr. PITKIN moved that the House now proceed to the orders of the day. Negatived—55 to 40.

The question to postpone the said bill indefinitely being then again stated—

The motion was supported by Mr. WILLIAM REED, of Massachusetts, to whom Mr. FISK, of New York replied.

Mr. BARNETT then observing that this was the last day of the session, and that he found gentlemen were again commencing discussion on this question, required the previous question.

This call was supported by the House, by a vote of 57 to 42.

The SPEAKER being about to put the previous question in the usual form—

Mr. SHEFFEY moved that the bill lie on the table, and thereon required the yeas and nays; which motion was decided in the negative—For laying it on the table 47, against it 65, as follows:

The said main question was then taken, to wit: Shall the bill be read a third time? and passed in the affirmative—yeas 66, nays 48, as follows:

The said bill was then read the third time, when a motion was made by Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, to recommit the bill for amendment, which was negative. The question was then taken, Shall the bill pass? and decided in the affirmative.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. TROUP, from the managers appointed on the part of this House, at the conference, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments depending to the bill "fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," reported the following modifications:

That the Senate recede from the first amendment proposed to the bill;

That in lieu of the second amendment proposed, the Senate agree to substitute the word "ten," for the word "fifteen";

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to all the other amendments proposed by the Senate.

The House proceeded to consider the said modifications.

Mr. ROBERTSON said, that he hoped the report of the committee of conference would be agreed to. He had voted against the reduction of the Army to six thousand. He was now prepared to sanction a much larger force. Circumstances had occurred which produced considerable effect on his opinions. A report had been alluded to in debate, which merited much consideration. It is said that the Floridas had been ceded by Spain to Britain. Britain had very formally protested against our taking possession of a part of the country denominated West Florida. He had no doubt, from information recently received, that an attack was about to be made on Mobile. The enemy were building barges on board their fleet, evidently with a view to continue the conflict. He had no apprehension of their again visiting New Orleans; they would not soon, they would never, make another attempt upon that city. He believed Mobile was the object; they would be desirous of doing something to break their fall; to retrieve the expedition from utter disgrace. It is by no means clear, that a knowledge of the treaty would arrest their designs. He had no confidence in the good faith of England. He believed that war still raged in the South. He had said, that notwithstanding the treaty, it was probable an effort would be made to seize on West Florida. He entertained another opinion which he would express; he believed, that, had the English succeeded in getting possession of New Orleans, they would not have given it up; but they would have found out some pretext for holding it. Why was the acquisition of Louisiana introduced into discussion at Ghent? What connexion had that subject with any question of controversy between the United States and England? It had reached us through various channels, that all officers necessary for the civil government of the country had accompanied the grand expedition. Perhaps it might turn out, on explanation, that many important steps with a view to conquest and permanent occupation, had been taken after the determination to sign the treaty had been formed.

Under present circumstances, though hostile to a large army in time of peace, he was himself disposed to retain a larger force than ten thousand men; but he most earnestly hoped it would not be reduced below that number.

The question was taken to concur in the second modification, to wit: That the Military Peace Establishment shall consist of "ten" thousand men, instead of "fifteen" thousand, as proposed by the Senate; and it passed in the affirmative—yeas 70, nays 38, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Avery, Barnett, Bines, Bowen, Calhoun, Clendenin, Clopton, Comstock, Crawford, Creighton, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Duvall, Eppes, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hall, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Leferts, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McKim, Montgomery, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Seybert, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Stuart, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Winter, and Yancey.

The question was then taken, that the House recede from their disagreement to so much of the amendments of the Senate as proposes to strike out a part of the 6th and the whole of the 7th and 8th sections of the bill, being that part thereof which allows donations in land to disbanded officers and soldiers, as is proposed in the third modification recommended by the conferees; and passed in the affirmative—yeas 57, nays 55, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. The question was then taken to recede from their disagreement to the residue of the amendments of the Senate, as proposed in the third modification recommended by the conferees; and passed in the affirmative.

CLOSING BUSINESS.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "to vest more effectually in the State Courts and in the District Courts of the United States jurisdiction in the cases therein mentioned," with an amendment; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendment was concurred in by the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled "An act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed, by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States," with amendments.

The amendments were read; and a motion was made by Mr. FISK, of New York, that the bill be postponed indefinitely; which was determined in the negative.

The amendments were then in part concurred in, and in part disagreed to by the House.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate "for the relief of sundry persons in the service of the United States, in consequence of the destruction of their tools by fire at the Navy Yard." The bill was reported without amendment, read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1815," with amendments; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said amendments were read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The House then went into Committee on the said amendments, agreed to the same; and they were concurred in by the House.

The order of the day on the bill from the Senate, "to authorize the settlement and payment of certain claims for the services of the militia," being called, Mr. FORSYTH moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the said bill, and to refer the same to the Secretary of War, with instructions to report at the next session of Congress the amount and description of claims for which it provides, and the grounds upon which payment has been refused by the United States.

A division of the question on this said motion was called for; when the question was taken on discharging the Committee of the Whole, and passed in the affirmative; and, on motion of Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, the bill, together with the remaining member of the motion made by Mr. FORSYTH, was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. SHARP, a committee was appointed, jointly, with a committee to be appointed by the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses are now ready to adjourn, and desire to know whether he has any further communication to make to them during the present session.

Mr. SHARP, from the joint committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him of the approaching recess of Congress, reported that they had performed that duty, and that the President answered that he had no further communication to make to Congress at the present session.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate, having completed the Legislative business before them, are now ready to adjourn.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate, to inform them that this House, having completed the business before them, are also ready to adjourn; and that the Clerk do go with the said message.

The Clerk having went with the said message, and being returned, the SPEAKER adjourned the House sine die.

SUPPLEMENTAL JOURNAL

Of such proceedings of the House of Representatives, at the Third Session of the Thirteenth Congress, as, pending their consideration, were ordered to be kept secret, but, respecting which, the injunction of secrecy was afterwards taken off by order of the House.

THURSDAY, February 23, 1815.

The confidential Message of the PRESIDENT of THE UNITED STATES, communicated on this day, was then taken up, and read, as follows, viz:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Congress will have seen, by the communication from the Consul General of the United States, at Algiers, laid before them on the 17th of November, 1812, the hostile proceedings of the Dey against that functionary. These have been followed by acts of more overt and direct warfare against the citizens of the United States trading in the Mediterranean; some of whom are still detained in captivity, notwithstanding the attempts which have been made to ransom them, and are treated with the rigor usual on the coast of Barbary.

The considerations which rendered it unnecessary and unimportant to commence hostile operations on the part of the United States, being now terminated by the peace with Great Britain, which opens the prospect of an active and valuable trade of their citizens within the range of the Algerine cruisers, I recommend to Congress the expediency of an act declaring the existence of a state of war between the United States and the Dey of Algiers; and of such provisions as may be requisite for a vigorous prosecution of it to a successful issue.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23, 1815.

Ordered, That the said communication be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WRIGHT then submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire of the President the reasons assigned by the Dey of Algiers for his conduct towards the United States.

And the question being taken, "Will the House now consider the resolution?" it was determined in the negative.

FRIDAY, February 24.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the President's Message of yesterday, reported "a bill for the protection of the commerce of the United States against the Algerine cruisers;" which was twice read.

Mr. GASTON then moved to commit the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instructions "to inquire into and report, in detail, the facts upon which the measure contemplated by the bill is predicated."

Mr. HALL then moved to postpone the bill indefinitely; and, the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 21, nays 108, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alston, Avery, Butler, Comstock, Crawford, Crouch, Davis of Pennsylvania, Griffin, Hall, Johnson of Kentucky, Lyle, Pearson, Piper, Rea of Pennsylvania, Smith of Pennsylvania, Stanford, Strong, Tannehill, Wheaton, Williams, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HALL then moved to amend the motion of Mr. GASTON, by striking out the words "the Committee on Foreign Relations," and inserting, in lieu thereof, the words "a select committee;" and, the question being taken thereon, it passed in the affirmative.

Mr. HAWKINS then moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Monday next; which was determined in the negative.

The question was then taken on agreeing to Mr. GASTON's motion, as amended, and passed in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alston, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Bowen, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Butler, Caperton, Cannon, Champion, Cilley, Clopton, Condict, Cooper, Creighton, Culpeper, Davenport, Desha, Duvall, Ely, Eppes, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Gaston, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Hale, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Henderson, Hungerford, Hulbert, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lefferts, Lovett, Macon, Markell, McKim, Moore, Moseley, Ormsby, Pearson, Pickering, Pickens, Pitkin, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Ruggles, Sevier, Seybert, Sheffey, Sherwood, Shipherd, Slaymaker, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Taylor, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Williams, Wilson of Massachusetts, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Winter, Wood, and Wright.

Supplemental Journal.

Robertson, Sage, Sharp, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Tannehill, Telfair, Udree, and Yancey.

Ordered, That Messrs. GASTON, FORSYTH, WARD of Massachusetts, GROSVENOR, SEYBERT, McKIM, and NEWTON, be the said committee.

TUESDAY, February 28.

Mr. GASTON, from the select committee, to whom was referred, on the 24th instant, the bill for "the protection of the commerce of the United States against the Algerine cruisers," with instructions to inquire into, and report in detail, the facts upon which the measure contemplated by the bill is predicated," made a report thereupon; which was read. The report is as follows:

The committee to whom has been referred the bill "for the protection of the commerce of the United States against the Algerine cruisers," with instructions to inquire and report, in detail, the facts upon which the measure contemplated by the bill is predicated, report:

That, in the month of July, 1812, the Dey of Algiers taking offence, or pretending to take offence, at the quantity and quality of a shipment of military stores, made by the United States in pursuance of the stipulation in the Treaty of 1795, and, refusing to receive the stores, extorted from the American Consul General at Algiers, by threats of personal imprisonment, and of reducing to slavery all Americans in his power, a sum of money claimed as arrearages of treaty stipulations, and denied by the United States to be due; and then compelled the Consul, and all citizens of the United States at Algiers, abruptly to quit his dominions.

It further appears to the committee, that, on the 25th of August following, the American brig Edwin, of Salem, owned by Nathaniel Silsbee of that place, while on a voyage from Malta to Gibraltar, was taken by an Algerine corsair, and carried into Algiers as prize. The commander of the brig, Captain George Campbell Smith, and the crew, ten in number, have ever since been detained in captivity, with the exception of two of them, whose release has been effected under circumstances not indicating any change of hostile temper on the part of the Dey. It also appears that a vessel, sailing under the Spanish flag, has been condemned in Algiers as laying a false claim to that flag, and concealing her true American character. In this vessel was taken a Mr. Pollard, who claims to be an American citizen, and is believed to be of Norfolk, Virginia, and who, as an American citizen, is kept in captivity. The Government, justly solicitous to relieve these unfortunate captives, caused an agent (whose connexion with the Government was not disclosed) to be sent to Algiers, with the means, and with instructions to effect their ransom, if it could be done at a price not exceeding three thousand dollars per man. The effort did not succeed, because of the Dey's avowed policy to increase the number of his American slaves, in order to be able to compel a renewal of his Treaty with the United States on terms suited to his rapacity. Captain Smith, Mr. Pollard, and the master of the Edwin, are not confined, nor kept at hard labor; but the rest of the captives are subjected to the well known horrors of Algerine slavery. The committee have not been apprized of any other specific outrages upon the persons or property of American citizens, besides those stated; and they apprehend that the fewness of these is attributable to the want of opportunity, and not of inclination in the Dey, to prey upon our commerce, and to enslave our citizens. The war with Britain has hitherto shut the Mediterranean against American vessels, which it may be presumed will now shortly venture upon it.

The committee are all of opinion, upon the evidence which has been laid before them, that the Dey of Algiers considers his Treaty with the United States as at an end, and is waging war against them. The evidence upon which this opinion is founded, and from which are extracted the facts above stated, accompanies this report, and with it is respectfully submitted.

The said bill being then amended, by prefixing the following preamble—

"Whereas the Dey of Algiers, on the coast of Barbary, has commenced a predatory warfare against the United States,"

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH moved further to amend the bill by inserting, after the word "aforesaid," in the 4th line of the second section, the following words:

"If the Dey of Algiers shall not, on demand by an accredited agent of the United States, duly authorized for that purpose, deliver up, without delay, all American citizens who may be detained by him as prisoners or slaves, and return to a state of amity with the United States, by a treaty of peace."

And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 47, nays 92, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Ciley, Condict, Cooper, Davenport, Ely, Geddes, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Hale, Hasbrouck, Henderson, Hungerford, Jackson, of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lovett, Moseley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, Ruggles, Sheffey, Slaymaker, Stanford, Strong, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Thompson, Vose, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Winter.

NAYS—Messrs. Mr. STANFORD then moved to amend the same section, by inserting, after the word "into," in the 7th line, the word "some," and after the word "port," in the same line, the words "of the United States;" which motion was determined in the negative.

Mr. S. then moved to amend the same section, by inserting, after the word "of," in the tenth line, the word "maritime;" which was also determined in the negative.

The question was taken on engrossing the bill, and reading it a third time, and passed in the affirmative—yeas 94, nays 32, as follows :

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Anderson, Barbour, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bines, Bowen, Bradbury, Burwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Champion, Clopton, Condict, Cox, Creighton, Cuthbert, Desha, Duvall, Eppes, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdine, Grosvenor, Hale, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Hulbert, Irwin, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lowndes, Macon, McCoy, Montgomery, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Oakley, Ormsby, Pickens, Pleasants, Potter, John Reed, Wm. And the bill having been engrossed, was read a third time, and sent to the Senate by the hands of Mr. GASTON and Mr. FORSYTH.

THURSDAY, March 2.

The bill "for the protection of the commerce of the United States against the Algerine cruisers," was returned from the Senate, they having passed it without amendment. And the injunction of secrecy was removed.

APPENDIX

TO THE HISTORY OF THE THIRTEENTH CONGRESS.

[THIRD SESSION.]

COMPRISING THE MOST IMPORTANT DOCUMENTS ORIGINATING DURING THAT CONGRESS, AND THE PUBLIC ACTS PASSED BY IT.

GREAT BRITAIN—RETALIATION.

[Communicated to Congress, the 26th day of September, 1814.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States :

I transmit to Congress, for their information, copies of a letter from Admiral Cochrane, commanding His Britannic Majesty's naval forces on the American station, to the Secretary of State, with his answer, and a reply from Admiral Cochrane.

JAMES MADISON.

SEPTEMBER 26, 1814.

Vice Admiral Sir Alexander Cochrane to Mr. Monroe.
HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S SHIP THE TONNANT, PATUXENT RIVER,
August 18, 1814.

SIR: Having been called upon by the Governor General of the Canadas to aid him in carrying into effect measures of retaliation against the inhabitants of the United States for the wanton destruction committed by their army in Upper Canada, it has become imperiously my duty, conformably with the nature of the Governor General's application, to issue to the naval force under my command, an order to destroy and lay waste such towns and districts upon the coast as may be found assailable.

I had hoped that this contest would have terminated without my being obliged to resort to severities which are contrary to the usage of civilized warfare, and as it has been with extreme reluctance and concern that I have found myself compelled to adopt this system of devastation, I shall be equally gratified if the conduct of the Executive of the United States will authorize my staying such proceedings, by making reparation to the suffering inhabitants of Upper Canada, thereby manifesting that, if the destructive measures pursued by their army were ever sanctioned, they will no longer be permitted by the Government. I have the honor to be, &c.

ALEX. COCHRANE,

Vice Admiral, Commander, &c.

HON. JAMES MONROE.

13th CON. 3d SESS.—41

Mr. Monroe to Sir Alexander Cochrane, Vice Admiral, &c.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
September 6, 1814.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 18th of August, stating that, having been called on by the Governor General of the Canadas, to aid him in carrying into effect measures of retaliation against the inhabitants of the United States for the wanton desolation committed by their army in Upper Canada, it has become your duty, conformably with the nature of the Governor General's application, to issue to the naval force under your command an order to destroy and lay waste such towns and districts upon the coast as may be found assailable.

It is seen, with the greatest surprise, that this system of devastation, which has been practised by the British forces, so manifestly contrary to the usage of civilized warfare, is placed by you on the ground of retaliation. No sooner were the United States compelled to resort to war against Great Britain, than they resolved to wage it in a manner most consonant to the principles of humanity, and to those friendly relations which it was desirable to preserve between the two nations after the restoration of peace. They perceived, however, with the deepest regret, that a spirit, alike just and humane, was neither cherished nor acted on by your Government. Such an assertion would not be hazarded if it was not supported by facts, the proof of which has, perhaps, already carried the same conviction to other nations that it has to the people of these States. Without dwelling on the deplorable cruelties committed by the savages in the British ranks, and in British pay, at the river Raisin, which, to this day, has never been disavowed or atoned for, I refer, as more immediately connected with the subject of your letter, to the wanton desolation that was committed at Havre-de-Grace and at Georgetown, early in the Spring of 1813. These villages were burnt and ravaged by the naval forces of Great Britain, to the ruin of their unarmed inhabitants, who saw, with astonishment, that they derived no protection to their property from the laws of war. During the same season, scenes of invasion and pillage, carried on under the same authority, were witnessed all along the waters of the Chesapeake, to an extent inflicting the most serious private distress, and under circumstances that justified the suspicion that revenge and cupidity, rather than the manly motives that should dictate the hostility of a high-minded foe, led to their perpetration. The late destruction of the houses of the Government in this city is another act which comes necessarily into view. In the wars of modern Europe, no example of the kind, even among nations the most hostile to each other, can be traced. In the course of ten years past, the capitals of the principal Powers of the continent of Europe have been conquered, and occupied alternately by the victorious armies of each other, and no instance of such wanton and unjustifiable destruction has been seen. We must go back to distant and barbarous ages to find a parallel for the acts of which I complain.

Although these acts of desolation invited, if they did not impose on the Government the necessity of retaliation, yet in no instance has it been authorized.

The burning of the village of Newark in Upper Canada, posterior to the early outrages above enumerated, was not executed on that principle. The village of Newark adjoined Fort George, and its destruction was justified by the officers who ordered it, on the ground that it became necessary in the military operations there. The act, however, was disavowed by the Government. The burning which took place at Long Point was unauthorized by the Government, and the conduct of the officer subjected to the investigation of a military tribunal. For the burning at St. David's, committed by stragglers, the officer who commanded in that quarter was dismissed, without a trial, for not preventing it.

I am commanded by the President distinctly to state, that it as little comports with any orders which have been issued to the military and naval commanders of the United States, as it does with the established and known humanity of the American nation, to pursue a system which it appears you have adopted. This Government owes it to itself, to the principles which it has ever held sacred, to disavow, as justly chargeable to it, any such wanton, cruel, and unjustifiable warfare.

Whatever unauthorized irregularities may have been committed by any of its troops, it would have been ready, acting on these principles of sacred and eternal obligation, to disavow, and, as far as might be practicable, to repair. But, in the plan of desolating warfare which your letter so explicitly makes known, and which is attempted to be excused on a plea so utterly groundless, the President perceives a spirit of deep-rooted hostility, which, without the evidence of such facts, he could not have believed existed, or would have been carried to such an extremity.

For the reparation of injuries, or whatever nature they may be, not sanctioned by the law of nations, which the military and naval force of either Power may have committed against the other, this Government will always be ready to enter into reciprocal arrangements. It is presumed that your Government will neither expect nor propose any which are not reciprocal.

Should your Government adhere to a system of desolation, so contrary to the views and practice of the United States, so revolting to humanity, and repugnant to the sentiments and usages of the civilized world, whilst it will be seen with the deepest regret, it must and will be met with a determination and constancy becoming a free people contending in a just cause for their essential rights and dearest interests.

I have the honor to be, &c.

September 19, 1814.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 6th instant this morning, in reply to the one which I addressed to you from the Patuxent.

As I have no authority from my Government to enter upon any kind of discussion relative to the points contained in your letter, I have only to regret that there does not appear to be any hope that I shall be authorized to recall my general order; which has been further sanctioned by a subsequent request from Lieutenant General Sir George Prevost.

A copy of your letter will this day be forwarded by me to England, and, until I receive instructions from my Government, the measures which I have adopted must be persisted in, unless remuneration be made to the inhabitants of the Canadas for the injuries they have sustained from the outrages committed by the troops of the United States.

I have the honor to be, yours, &c.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States :

I transmit for the information of Congress the communications last received from the Ministers Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States at Ghent, explaining the course and actual state of their negotiations with the Plenipotentiaries of Great Britain.

JAMES MADISON.

DECEMBER 1, 1814.

Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, to the Plenipotentiaries of the United States for treating of peace with Great Britain.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 15, 1813.

GENTLEMEN : I had the honor, on the — ultimo, to receive from Mr. Adams two letters, one bearing date 30th September, the other on the 17th October last, communicating the overture of the Emperor of Russia to promote peace by his friendly mediation between the United States and Great Britain. On the day following, Mr. Daschkoff, the Russian Minister, made a similar communication to this Department. The subject has, in consequence, been duly considered, and I have now to make known to you the result.

The President has not hesitated to accept the mediation of Russia, and he indulges a strong hope that it will produce the desired effect. It is not known that Great Britain has acceded to the proposition, but it is presumed that she will not decline it. The President thought it improper to postpone his decision until he should hear of that of the British Government. Sincerely desirous of peace, he has been willing to avail himself of every opportunity which might tend to promote it, on just and honorable conditions, and in accepting this overture he has been particularly gratified to evince, by the manner of it, the distinguished consideration which the United States entertain for the Emperor Alexander. Should the British Government accept the mediation, the negotiation to which it leads will be held at St. Petersburg. The President commits it to you, for which a commission is enclosed, and he has appointed Mr. Harris secretary of the mission.

The impressment of our seamen and illegal blockades, as exemplified more particularly in the Orders in Council, were the principal causes of the war. Had not Great Britain persevered obstinately in the violation of these important rights, the war would not have been declared. It will cease as soon as these rights are respected. The proposition made by Mr. Russell to the British Government immediately after the war, and the answer given by this Department to Admiral Warren's letter since, show the ground on which the United States were willing to adjust the controversy relative to impressment.

This has been further evinced by a report of the Committee of Foreign Relations of the House of Representatives, and an act of Congress passed in consequence of that report. By these documents you will see that, to accommodate this important difference, the United States are disposed to exclude British seamen altogether from the American service. This being effectually done, the British Government can have no pretext for the practice. How shall it be done? By restraints to be imposed by each nation on the naturalization of the seamen of the other, excluding, at the same time, all others not naturalized? Or shall the right of each nation to naturalize the seamen of the other be prohibited, and each exclude from its service the natives of the other? Whatever the rule is, it ought to be reciprocal. If Great Britain is allowed to naturalize American seamen, the United States should enjoy the same privilege. If it is demanded that the United States shall exclude from their service all native British subjects, a like exclusion of American citizens from the British service ought to be reciprocated. The mode also should be common to both countries. Each should be at liberty to give the same facilities, or be bound to impose the same restraints that the other does. The President is willing to agree to either alternative, and to carry it into effect by the most eligible regulations that can be devised.

If the first alternative is adopted, the extent of the proposed exclusion will depend on the impediments to naturalization, on the efficacy of the regulations to prevent imposition, and the fidelity of their execution. The greater the difficulty in acquiring the right of citizenship, the easier will it be to avoid imposition, and the more complete the desired exclusion. The law of the last session of Congress relative to seamen proves how sincerely desirous the Legislative as well as Executive branch of our Government is, to adjust this controversy, on conditions which may be satisfactory to Great Britain. By that law it is made indispensable for every British subject who may hereafter become a citizen, to reside five years, without intermission, within the United States, and so many guards are imposed to prevent frauds, that it seems to be impossible that they should be eluded. No British subject can be employed in a public or private ship of the United States, unless he produces to the commander, in the one instance, and to the collector, in the other, a certified copy of the act by which he became naturalized. A list of the crew, in the case of a private ship, must be taken, certified and recorded by the collector, and the consuls or commercial agents of Great Britain may object to any seamen, and attend the investigation. The commander of a public ship receiving a person not duly qualified, shall forfeit a thousand dollars, and the commander or owner of a private ship, knowing thereof, five hundred dollars, to be recovered in any action of debt, one-half to the informer, and one-half to the United States. It is also made penal, punishable as a felony by imprisonment and labor from three to five years, or by fine from five hundred to one thousand dollars, for any person to forge or counterfeit, or to pass or use any forged or counterfeited certificate of citizenship, or to sell or dispose of one.

It may fairly be presumed, that, if this law should be carried into effect, it would exclude all British seamen from our service.

By requiring five years continued residence in the United States, as the condition of citizenship, few if any British seamen would ever take advantage of it. Such as had left Great Britain, and had resided five years in this country, would be likely to abandon the sea forever. And by making it the duty of the commanders of our public, and of the collectors in the case of private ships, to require an authenticated copy from the clerk of the court, before which a British subject, who offered his service, had been naturalized, as indispensable to his admission, and highly penal in either to take a person not duly qualified, and by allowing also British agents to object to any one offering his service, and to prosecute by suit the commander or collector, as the case might be, for receiving an improper person, it seems to be impossible that such should be received.

If the second alternative is adopted, that is, if all native British subjects are to be hereafter excluded from our service, it is important that the stipulation providing for it should operate so as not to affect those who have been already naturalized. By our law, all the rights of natives are given to naturalized citizens. It is contended by some that these complete rights do not extend beyond the limits of the United States; that, in naturalizing a foreigner, no State can absolve him from the obligation which he owes to his former Government, and that he becomes a citizen in a qualified sense only. This doctrine, if true in any case, is less applicable to the United States than to any other Power. Expatriation seems to be a natural right, and, by the original character of our institutions, founded by compact on principle, and particularly by the unqualified investment of the adopted citizen with the full rights of the native, all that the United States could do, to place him on the same footing, has been done. In point of interest, the object is of little importance to either party. The number to be affected by the stipulation is inconsiderable; nor can that be a cause of surprise, when the character of that class of men is considered. It rarely happens that a seaman, who settles on a farm, or engages in a trade, and pursues it for any length of time, returns to sea. His youthful days are exhausted in his first occupation. He leaves it with regret, and adopts another, either in consequence of marriage, of disease, or as an asylum for old age.

To a stipulation which shall operate prospectively only, the same objection does not apply. In naturalizing foreigners, the United States may prescribe the limit to which their privileges shall extend. If it is made a condition that no native British subject, who may hereafter become a citizen, shall be employed in our public or private ships, their exclusion will violate no right. Those who might become citizens afterwards would acquire the right, subject to that condition, and would be bound by it. To such a stipulation, the President is willing to assent, although he would much prefer the alternative of restraints on naturalization; and, to prevent frauds, and to carry the same fully into effect, you are authorized to apply all the restraints and checks, with the necessary modifications, to suit the cases that are provided in the act above recited, relative to seamen, for the purposes of that act.

In requiring that the stipulation to exclude British seamen from our service, with the regulations for carrying it into effect, be made reciprocal, the President desires that you make a provision, authorizing the United States, if they should be so disposed, to dispense with the obligations imposed by it on American citizens. The liberal spirit of our Government and laws is unfriendly to restraints on our citizens, such at least, as are imposed on British subjects, from becoming members of other societies. This has been shown in the law of the last session, relative to seamen, to which your particular attention has been already drawn. This provision may likewise be reciprocated if desired.

The President is not particularly solicitous that either of these alternatives (making the proposed reservation in case the latter be) should be preferred. To secure the United States against impressment he is willing to adopt either. He expects in return, that a clear and distinct provision shall be made against the practice. The precise form in which it may be done is not insisted on, provided the import is explicit. All that is required is, that, in consideration of the act to be performed on the part of the United States, the British Government shall stipulate in some adequate manner, to terminate or forbear the practice of impressment from American vessels.

It has been suggested, as an expedient made for the adjustment of this controversy, that British cruisers should have a right to search our vessels for British seamen, but that the commanders thereof should be subjected to penalties in case they made mistakes, and took from them American citizens. By this the British Government would acquire the right of search for seamen, with that of impressing from our vessels the subjects of all other Powers. It will not escape your attention that, by admitting the right, in any case, we give up the principle, and leave the door open to every kind of abuse. The same objection is applicable to any and every other arrangement which withholds the respect due to our flag, by not allowing it to protect the crew sailing under it.

If the first alternative should be adopted, it will follow that none of the British seamen who may be in the United States at the time the treaty takes effect, and who shall not have become citizens, will be admitted into our service until they acquire that right.

If the second is adopted, the number of native British seamen, who have been naturalized, and will be admissible into our service, will not, it is believed, exceed a few hundred; all others who may be in the United States at the time the treaty takes effect, or who may arrive afterwards, will be excluded.

As a necessary incident to an adjustment on the principle of either alternative, it is expected that all American seamen, who have been impressed, will be discharged, and that those who have been naturalized, under the British laws, by compulsive service, will be permitted to withdraw.

I have to repeat that the great object which you have to secure, in regard to impressment, is, that our flag shall protect the crew, and, providing for this in a satisfactory manner, that you are authorized to secure Great Britain effectually against the employment of her seamen in the service of the United States. This, it is believed, would be done by the adoption of either the above alternatives, and the application to that which may be adopted, of the checks contained in the law of the last session, relative to seamen; in aid of which it will always be in the power of Great Britain to make regulations operating in her own ports with a view to the same effect. To terminate, however, this controversy, in a manner satisfactory to both parties, the President is willing, should other checks be suggested as likely to be more effectual, consistent with the spirit of our Constitution, that you should adopt them. The strong feature of the first alternative, which authorizes the naturalization of seamen, requires their continued residence in the United States for five years, as indispensable to the attainment of that right. In case this alternative be adopted, the President is willing, for example, to secure a compliance with that condition, to make it the duty of each alien, who may be desirous to become a citizen, to appear in court every year, for the term of five years, until his right shall be completed. This example is given, not as a limitation, but as an illustration of your power; for to the exclusion of British seamen from our service no repugnance is felt. To such exclusion the amicable adjustment of this controversy with Great Britain affords a strong motive, but not the only one. It is a growing sentiment in the United States that they ought to depend on their own population for the supply of their ships of war and merchant service. Experience has shown that it is an abundant resource. In expressing this sentiment you will do it in a manner to inspire more fully a confidence that the arrangement which you may enter into will be carried faithfully into effect, without derogating, however, from the conciliatory spirit of the accommodation.

A strong desire has heretofore been expressed by the British Government to obtain of the United States an arrangement to prevent the desertion of British seamen when in our ports, and it cannot be doubted that a stipulation to that effect would be highly satisfactory as well as useful to Great Britain. It is fairly to be presumed that it, alone, would afford to the British Government a strong inducement to enter into a satisfactory arrangement of the difference relating to impressment. The claim is not inadmissible, especially as the United States have a reciprocal interest in the restoration of deserters from American vessels in British ports; you may, therefore, agree to an article, such as has been heretofore authorized by the United States, which shall make it the duty of each party to deliver them up.

Of the right of the United States to be exempted from the degrading practice of impressment, so much has been already said, and with such ability, that it would be useless, especially to you, who are otherwise so well acquainted with it, to dilate on its merits. I must observe, however, that the practice is utterly repugnant to the law of nations; that it is supported by no treaty with any nation; that it was never acquiesced in by any; and that a submission to it by the United States would be the abandonment, in favor of Great Britain, of all claim to neutral rights, and of all other rights on the ocean.

This practice is not founded on any belligerent right. The greatest extent to which the belligerent claim has been carried, over the vessels of neutral nations, is, to board and take from them persons in the land and sea service of an enemy, contraband of war, and enemy's property. All nations agree respecting the two first articles, but there has been and still exists a diversity of opinion as to the last. On that and other questions of considerable importance, disputes have arisen which are yet unsettled. The Empress Catherine, of Russia, a distinguished advocate of just principles, placed herself, in 1780, at the head of neutral nations, in favor of a liberal construction of their rights, and her successors have generally followed her example. In all the discussions on these topics, we find nothing of the British claim to impressment; no acknowledgment of it in any treaty, or proof of submission to it by any Power. If instances have occurred in which British cruisers have taken British seamen from the vessels of other nations, they were, as it is presumed, in cases either not acquiesced in, or of an extraordinary nature only, affording no countenance to their practice and pretension in relation to the United States. Cases of this kind, if such there be, afford no proof of a systematic claim in the British Government to impressment, or of submission to it by other Powers. This claim has been set up against the United States only, who have, in consequence thereof, been compelled to discuss its merits.

The claim is, in fact, traced to another source, the allegiance due by British subjects to their Sovereign, and his right, by virtue thereof, to their service. This has been distinctly stated in a late declaration by the Prince Regent. Knowing the nature of the claim, we know also the extent of the right and obligations incident to it. Allegiance is a political relation between a sovereign and his people. It is the obligation which binds the latter in return for the protection which they receive. These reciprocal duties have the same limit. They are confined to the dominions of the sovereign, beyond which he has no rights, can afford no protection, and of course can claim no allegiance. A citizen or subject of one Power, entering the dominions of another, owes allegiance to the latter in return for the protection he receives. Whether a sovereign has a right to claim the service of such of his subjects as have left his own dominions, is a question respecting which also a difference of opinion may exist. It is certain that no sovereign has a right to pursue his subjects into the territories of another, be the motive for it what it may. Such an entry, without the consent of the other Power, would be a violation of its territory, and an act of hostility. Offenders, even conspirators, cannot be pursued by one Power into the territory of another, nor are they delivered up by the latter, except in compliance with treaties, or by favor. That the vessels of a nation are considered a part of its territory, with the exception of the belligerent right only, is a principle too well established to be brought into discussion. Each State has exclusive jurisdiction over its own vessels. Its laws govern in them, and offences against those laws are punishable by its tribunals only. The flag of a nation protects everything sailing under it in time of peace, and in time of war likewise, with the exception of the belligerent rights growing out of the war. An entry on board the vessels of one Power by the cruisers of another, in any other case, and the exercise of any other authority over them, is a violation of right, and an act of hostility.

The British Government, aware of the truth of this doctrine, has endeavored to avoid its consequences in the late declaration of the Prince Regent. It has not contended that British cruisers have a right to pursue and search our vessels for British seamen. It asserts only that they have a right to search them for other objects, and being on board for a lawful cause, and finding British seamen there, that they have a right to impress and bring them away, under the claim of allegiance. When we see a systematic pursuit of our vessels by British cruisers, and the impressment of seamen from them, not at a port of the enemy, where a regular blockade has been instituted, and by the blockading squadron, but in every part of the ocean, on our coast, and even in our harbors, it is difficult to believe that impressment is not the real motive, and the other the pretext for it. But, to place this argument of the British Government on the strongest ground, let it be admitted that the entry was lawful, is it so to commit an act not warranted by the purpose for which the entry was made? There is a levity in this argument which neither suits the parties nor the subject. The British Government founds its right of impressment from our ships on that of allegiance, which is a permanent right, equally applicable to peace and war. The right of impressment, therefore, from the vessels of other Powers must likewise be permanent, and equally applicable to peace and war. It would not, however, take this broad ground, lest the injustice and extravagance of the pretension might excite the astonishment and indignation of other Powers, to whom it would be equally applicable. To claim it as a belligerent right would have been equally unjust and absurd, as no trace of it could be found in the belligerent code. The British Government was therefore reduced to a very embarrassing dilemma. To acknowledge that it could not support the claim on either principle would be to relinquish it, and yet it could rely on neither. It endeavored to draw some aid from both. A state of war exists which brings the parties together, Great Britain as a belligerent, and the United States as a neutral Power. British officers have now a right to board and search American vessels, but for what? Persons in the service of an enemy, contraband of war, or enemy's property? This would not accomplish the end. It is, however, the utmost limit of the belligerent right. Allegiance, which is an attribute of sovereignty, comes to her aid and communicates all the necessary power. The national character of the neutral vessel ceases. The complete right of sovereignty and jurisdiction over it is transferred to Great Britain. It is on this foundation that the British Government has raised this monstrous superstructure. It is with this kind of argument that it attempts to justify its practice of impressment from our vessels.

The remark contained in the declaration of the Prince Regent, that, in impressing British seamen from American vessels, Great Britain exercised no right which she was not willing to acknowledge as appertaining equally to the Government of the United States, with respect to American seamen in British merchant ships, proves only that the British Government is conscious of the justice of the claim, and desirous of giving to it such aid as may be derived from a plausible argument. The semblance of equality, however, in this proposition, which strikes at first view, disappears on a fair examination. It is unfair, first, because it is impossible for the United States to take advantage of it. Impressment is not an American practice, but utterly repugnant to our Constitution and laws. In offering to reciprocate it nothing was offered, as the British Government well knew. It is unfair, secondly, because if impressment was allowable, a reciprocation of the practice would be no equivalent to the United States. The exercise of a right in common, at sea, by two nations, each over the vessels of the other, the one powerful and the other comparatively weak, would be to put the latter completely at the mercy of the former. Great Britain, with her vast navy, would soon be the only party which made impressment. The United States would be compelled to abstain from it, and either to submit to the British rule, with all the abuses incident to power, or to resist it. But should the United States be permitted to make impressment from British vessels, the effect would be unequal. Great Britain has, perhaps, thirty ships of war at sea to one of the United States, and would profit of the arrangement in that proportion. Besides, impressment is a practice incident to war—in which view, likewise, the inequality is not less glaring, she being at least thirty years at war to one of the United States. Other considerations prove that the British Government made this acknowledgment merely as a pretext to justify its practice of impressment, without intending that the right or practice should ever be reciprocated. What would be the effect of its adoption by American ships of war with British merchant vessels? An American officer boards a British merchant vessel, and claims, as American citizens, whom he pleases. How many British seamen would disclaim a title which would take them to the United States, and secure them there all the advantages of citizenship? The rule of evidence, as the ground of impressment in every instance, must likewise be reciprocated between the two Governments. The acknowledgment of the men would surely be a better proof of their national character than the decision of a British officer who boarded an American vessel, however impartial he might be, and strong his power of discrimination, when opposed by the voluntary and solemn declaration of the party. In this way we might draw from the British service the greater part, if not all their seamen. I might further ask, why was this acknowledgment made at this late period, for the first time only, after the declaration of war, and when, on that account, it could produce no effect? In the various discussions of this subject, in many of which it has been demanded whether the British Government would tolerate such a practice from American ships of war, no such intimation was ever given.

If Great Britain had found the employment of her seamen in our service injurious to her, and been disposed to respect our rights, the regular course of proceeding would have been for her Government to have complained to the Government of the United States of the injury, and to have proposed a remedy. Had this been done, and no reasonable remedy been adopted, sound in principle and reciprocal in its operation, the British Government might have had some cause of complaint, and some plea for taking the remedy into its own hands. Such a procedure would, at least, have given to its claim of impressment the greatest plausibility. We know that such complaint was never made, except in defence of the practice of impressment, and that, in the meantime, the practice has gone on, and grown into a usage, which, with all its abuses, had resistance been longer delayed, might have become a law. The origin and progress of this usurpation afford strong illustrations of the British policy. The practice and the claim began together, soon after the close of our Revolutionary war, and were applicable to deserters only. They extended next to all British seamen; then to all British subjects, including, as in the case of emigrants from Ireland, persons who would not have been subject to impressment in British ports, not being seafaring men; and, finally, to Swedes, Danes, and others, known to be not British subjects, and by their protections appearing to be naturalized citizens of the United States.

Other views may be taken of the subject, to show the unlawfulness and absurdity of the British claim. If British cruisers have a right to take British seamen from our vessels, without regarding the abuses inseparable from the practice, they may take from them, on the same principle, and with much greater reason, every species of property to which the British Government has any kind of claim. Allegiance cannot give to a sovereign a better right to take his subjects than ownership to take his property. There would be no limit to this pretension or its consequences. All property forfeited by exportation, contrary to the laws of Great Britain, every article to which her sovereignty, jurisdiction, or ownership would extend, in British vessels, would be liable to seizure in those of the United States. The laws of England would be executory in them. Instead of being a part of the American, they would become a part of the British territory.

It might naturally be expected that Great Britain would have given, by her conduct, some support to her pretensions; that, if she had not disclaimed altogether the principle of naturalization, she would at least have excluded from her service foreign seamen. Her conduct, however, has been altogether at variance with her precepts. She has given great facility to naturalization, in all instances where it could advance her interest, and peculiar encouragement to that of foreign seamen. She naturalizes by special act of Parliament; she naturalizes all persons who reside a certain term of years in British colonies, all those who are born of British subjects in foreign dominions, and all seamen who have served a certain short term in the British service, and would doubtless protect all such as British subjects, if required by them so to do. Her Governors of neighboring provinces are, at this time, compelling emigrants thither from the United States to bear arms against the United States.

The mediation offered by Russia presents to Great Britain, as well as to the United States, a fair opportunity of accommodating this controversy with honor. The interposition of so distinguished a Power, friendly to both parties, could not be declined by either, on just ground, especially by Great Britain, between whom and Russia there exists at this time a very interesting relation. When the British Ministers are made acquainted at St. Petersburg, with the conditions on which you are authorized to adjust this difference, it seems as if it would be impossible for Great Britain to decline them. Should she do it, still adhering to her former pretensions, her motive could not be misunderstood. The cause of the United States would thenceforward become the common cause of nations. A concession by them would operate to the disadvantage of every other Power. They would all find, in the conduct of Great Britain, an unequivocal determination to destroy the rights of other flags, and to usurp the absolute dominion of the ocean. It is to be presumed that the British Government will find it neither for the honor nor interest of Great Britain to push things to that extremity, but will have accepted this mediation, and have sent a Minister or Ministers to St. Petersburg with full powers to adjust the controversy on fair and just conditions.

Should improper impressions have been taken of the probable consequences of the war, you will have ample means to remove them. It is certain, that from its prosecution Great Britain can promise to herself no advantage, while she exposes herself to great expenses and to the danger of still greater losses. The people of the United States, accustomed to the indulgence of a long peace, roused by the causes and the progress of the war, are rapidly acquiring military habits and becoming a military people. Our knowledge in naval tactics has increased, as has our maritime strength. The gallantry and success of our little Navy have formed an epoch in naval history. The laurels which these brave men have gained, not for themselves, but for their country, from an enemy pre-eminent in naval exploits, for ages past, are among the proudest boasts of their grateful and affectionate fellow-citizens. Our manufactures have taken an astounding growth. In short, in every circumstance, in which the war is felt, its pressure tends evidently to unite our people, to draw out our resources, to invigorate our means, and to make us more truly an independent nation, and, as far as may be necessary, a great maritime Power.

If the British Government accepts the mediation of Russia, with a sincere desire to restore a good intelligence between the two countries, it may be presumed that a fair opportunity will be afforded for the arrangement of many other important interests, with advantage to both parties. The adjustment of the controversy relating to impressment only, though very important, would leave much unfinished. Almost every neutral right has been violated; and its violation persisted in to the moment that war was declared. The President sincerely desires, and it is doubtless for the interest of Great Britain, to prevent the like in future. The interposition of the Emperor of Russia to promote an accommodation of these differences is deemed particularly auspicious.

A strong hope is, therefore, entertained that full powers will be given to the British Commissioners to arrange all these grounds of controversy in a satisfactory manner. In entering on this interesting part of your duty, the first object which will claim your attention is that of blockade. The violation of our neutral right by illegal blockades, carried to an enormous extent, by Orders in Council, was a principal cause of the war. These orders, however, and with them the blockade of May, 1806, and, as is understood, all other illegal blockades, have been repealed, so that that cause of war has been removed. All that is now expected is, that the British Government will unite in a more precise definition of blockade, and in this no difficulty is anticipated, for having declared that no blockade would be legal, which was not supported by an adequate force, and that the blockades which it might institute should be supported by an adequate force, there appears to be, according to the just interpretation of these terms, no difference of opinion on the subject.

The British Government has recently, in two formal acts, given definitions of blockade, either of which would be satisfactory. The first is to be seen in the communication from Mr. Merry to this Department, bearing date on the 12th of April, 1804. The following are the circumstances attending it. Commodore Hood, the commander of a British squadron in the West Indies, in 1803, having declared the islands of Martinique and Guadeloupe in a state of blockade, without applying an adequate force to maintain it, the Secretary of State remonstrated against the illegality of the measure, which remonstrance was laid before the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, in England, who replied that they had sent "orders not to consider any blockade of those islands as existing unless in respect of particular ports, which might be actually invested, and then not to capture vessels, bound to such ports, unless they shall previously have been warned not to enter them." The second definition is to be found in a convention between Great Britain and Russia, in June, 1801, fourth section, third article, which declares, "that, in order to determine what characterizes a blockaded port, that denomination is given only to a port where there is, by the disposition of the Power which attacks it, with ships stationary or sufficiently near, an evident danger in entering." The President is willing for you to adopt either of these definitions; but prefers the first, as much more precise and determinate; and when it is considered that it was made the criterion by so formal an act, between the two Governments, it cannot be presumed that the British Government will object to the renewal of it. Nothing is more natural, after the differences which have taken place between the two countries, on this and other subjects, and the departure from this criterion by Great Britain, for reasons which are admitted by her no longer to exist, than that they should, on the restoration of a good understanding, recur to it again. Such a recurrence would be the more satisfactory to the President, as it would afford a proof of a disposition in the British Government, not simply to compromise a difference, but to re-establish sincere friendship between the two nations.

An interference with our commerce between enemy colonies and their parent country, was among the first violations of our neutral rights, committed by Great Britain in her present war with France. It took place in 1805, did extensive injury and produced universal excitement. In securing us against a repetition of it, you will attend to an article of the convention between Russia and Great Britain, entered into on the — day of —, 1801, to the eleventh article of the project of a treaty with Great Britain that was signed by Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney, on the 31st December, 1806, and to the instructions from this Department relating to that article, of the 20th May, 1807. The capture, by Great Britain, of almost all the islands of her enemies, diminishes the importance of any regulation of this subject; but, as they may be restored by a treaty of peace, it merits particular attention. It being understood, however, that unless such a trade can be obtained, in a proper extent, and without a relinquishment of the principle contended for by the United States, it will be best that the treaty be silent on the subject.

A disposition has been shown by the British Government to extend this principle so far as to inhibit a trade to neutrals, even between a Power at peace with Great Britain and her enemy; as, for example, between China and France. The absurdity of this pretension may prevent its being hereafter advanced. It will not, however, be unworthy of your attention.

By an order of the British Government in 1803, British cruisers were authorized to take neutral vessels, laden with innocent articles, on their return from an enemy's port, on the pretence that they had carried to such port contraband of war. This order is directly repugnant to the law of nations, as the circumstance of having contraband articles on board, bound to an enemy's port, is the only legal ground of seizure. The claim was relinquished by the British Government, in the ninth article of the project above recited. You will endeavor in like manner to provide against it. It is the practice of British cruisers to compel the commanders of neutral vessels which they meet at sea, either to board them in person with their papers, or to send their papers on board in their own boat by an officer. The injustice and irregularity of this procedure need not be mentioned. You will endeavor to suppress it in the manner proposed in the third article of a project communicated to Mr. Monroe at London, in his instructions of the 5th of January, 1804. You will endeavor likewise to restrict contraband of war, as much as is in your power, to the list contained in the fourth article of that project.

The pretensions of Great Britain to interdict the passage of neutral vessels, with their cargoes, from one port to another port of the enemy, is illegal and very injurious to the commerce of neutral Powers. Still more unjustifiable is the attempt to interdict their passage from one port of one independent nation to that of another, on the pretence that they are both enemies. You will endeavor to obtain, in both instances, a security for the neutral right.

Upon the whole subject I have to observe, that your first duty will be to conclude a peace with Great Britain, and that you are authorized to do it, in case you obtain a satisfactory stipulation against impressments, one which shall secure, under our flag, protection to the crew. The manner in which it may be done has been already stated, with the reciprocal stipulations which you may enter into to secure Great Britain against the injury of which she complains. If this encroachment of Great Britain is not provided against, the United States have appealed to arms in vain. If your efforts to accomplish it should fail, all further negotiations will cease, and you will return home without delay. It is possible that some difficulty may occur in arranging this article respecting its duration. To obviate this, the President is willing that it be limited to the present war in Europe. Resting, as the United States do, on the solid ground of right, it is not presumable that Great Britain, especially after the advantage she may derive from the arrangement proposed, would ever revive her pretension. In forming any stipulation on this subject, you will be careful not to impair by it the right of the United States, or to sanction the principle of the British claim.

It is deemed highly important, also, to obtain a definition of the neutral rights which I have brought to your view, especially of blockade, and in the manner suggested; but it is not to be made an indispensable condition of peace. After the repeal of the Orders in Council, and other illegal blockades, and the explanations attending it, it is not presumable that Great Britain will revive them. Should she do it, the United States will always have a corresponding resort in their own hands. You will observe, in every case in which you may not be able to obtain a satisfactory definition of the neutral right, that you enter into none respecting it.

Indemnity for losses seems to be a fair claim on the part of the United States, and the British Government, if desirous to strengthen the relations of friendship, may be willing to make it. In bringing the claim into view, you will not let it defeat the primary objects intrusted to you. It is not perceived on what ground Great Britain can resist this claim, at least in the cases in favor of which she stands pledged. Of these a note will be added.

[Confidential paragraph No. 2, omitted.]

You are at liberty to stipulate in the proposed treaty the same advantages, in the ports of the United States, in favor of British ships of war, that may be allowed to those of the most favored nations. This stipulation must be reciprocal.

[Confidential paragraph No. 3, omitted.]

No difficulty can arise from the case of the non-importation act, which will doubtless be terminated in consequence of the pacification. Should any stipulation to that effect be required, or found advantageous, you are at liberty to enter into it. Should peace be made, you may, in fixing the periods to which it shall take effect in different latitudes and distances, take for the basis the provisional articles of the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain in 1782, with such alterations as may appear to be just and reasonable.

In discharging the duties of the trust committed to you, the President desires that you will manifest the highest degree of respect for the Emperor of Russia, and confidence in the integrity and impartiality of his views. In arranging the question of impressment, and every question of neutral right, you will explain to his Government, without reserve, the claims of the United States, with the ground on which they severally rest. It is not doubted that from a conduct so frank and honorable the most beneficial effect will result.

[Confidential paragraph No. 4, omitted.]

I shall conclude by remarking that a strong hope is entertained that this friendly mediation of the Emperor Alexander will form an epoch in the relations between the United States and Russia, which will be extensively felt, and be long and eminently distinguished by the happy consequences attending it. Since 1780, Russia has been the pivot on which all questions of neutral right have essentially turned. Most of the wars which have disturbed the world in modern times have originated with Great Britain and France. These wars have affected distant countries, especially in their character as neutrals, and very materially the United States, who took no part in promoting them, and had no interest in the great objects of either Power.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to the Commissioners of the United States for treating of peace with Great Britain, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 23, 1813.

An opportunity offering, I avail myself of it to explain more fully the views of the President on certain subjects already treated on in your instructions, and to communicate his sentiments on some others, not adverted to in them.

The British Government having repealed the Orders in Council and the blockade of May, 1806, and all other illegal blockades, and having declared that it would institute no blockade which should not be supported by an adequate force, it was thought better to leave that question on that ground, than to continue the war, to obtain a more precise definition of blockade, after the other essential cause of the war, that of impressment, should be removed. But when it is considered that a stipulated definition of blockade will cost Great Britain nothing, after having thus recognised the principle, and that such definition is calculated to give additional confidence in the future security of our commerce, it is expected that she will agree to it. It is true, this cause of war being removed, the United States are under no obligation to continue it for the want of such stipulated definition, more especially as they retain in their hands the remedy against any new violation of their rights, whenever made. The same remark is applicable to the case of impressment; for, if the British Government had issued orders to its cruisers not to impress seamen from our vessels, and notified the same to this Government, that cause of war would also have been removed. In making peace, it is better for both nations that the controversy respecting blockade should be arranged by treaty, as well as that respecting impressment. The omission to arrange it may be productive of injury. Without a precise definition of blockade, improper pretensions might be set up on each side respecting their rights, which might possibly hazard the future good understanding between the two countries.

Should a restitution of territory be agreed on, it will be proper to make a provision for settling the boundary between the United States and Great Britain, on the St. Lawrence and the Lakes, from the point at which the line between them strikes the St. Lawrence to the northwest corner of the Lake of the Woods, according to the principles of the Treaty of Peace. The settlement of this boundary is important, from the circumstance that there are several islands in the river, and lakes of some extent and great value, the dominion over which is claimed by both parties. It may be an advisable course to appoint commissioners on each side, with full powers to adjust, on fair and equitable considerations, this boundary. To enable you to adopt a suitable provision for the purpose, it will be proper for you to recur to the instructions heretofore given on the subject, published in the documents in your possession.

Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, to the Plenipotentiaries of the United States at St. Petersburg.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 1, 1814.

GENTLEMEN: I have not received a letter from you since your appointment to meet Ministers from Great Britain at St. Petersburg, to negotiate a Treaty of Peace under the mediation of the Emperor of Russia. This is doubtless owing to the miscarriage of your despatches.

The Message of the President, of which I have the honor to transmit to you a copy, will make you acquainted with the progress of the war with Great Britain to that period, and the other documents which are forwarded will communicate what has since occurred.

Among the advantages attending our success in Upper Canada, was the important one of making capture of General Proctor's baggage, with all the public documents belonging to the British Government in his possession. It is probable that these documents will be laid before Congress, as they are of a nature highly interesting to the public. You will understand their true character by extracts of two letters from Governor Cass, which are enclosed to you. By these, it appears, that the British Government has exercised its influence over the Indian tribes within our limits as well as elsewhere in peace, for hostile purposes towards the United States; and that the Indian barbarities since the war were, in many instances, known to and sanctioned by the British Government.

Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, to the Plenipotentiaries of the United States at St. Petersburg.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 8, 1814.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to transmit to you a copy of a letter from Lord Castlereagh to this Department, and of a note from Lord Cathcart to the Russian Government, with my reply to the communication.

The arrangement of a negotiation to be held at Gottenburg, directly between the United States and Great Britain, without the aid of the Russian mediation, makes it necessary that new commissions should be issued correspondent with it, and, for this purpose, that a new nomination should be made to the Senate. The President instructs me to inform you that you will both be included in it; and that he wishes you to repair, immediately on the receipt of this, to the appointed rendezvous. It is possible that the business may not be limited to yourselves, on account of the great interests involved in the result. The commissions and instructions will be duly forwarded to you, as soon as the arrangements shall be finally made.

In taking leave of the Russian Government, you will be careful to make known to it the sensibility of the President to the friendly disposition of the Emperor, manifested by the offer of his mediation; the regret felt at its rejection by the British Government; and a desire that in future the greatest confidence and cordiality, and the best understanding, may prevail between the two Governments.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, to the American Plenipotentiaries at Gottenburg.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 28, 1814.

GENTLEMEN: The British Government having declined the Russian mediation, and proposed to treat directly with the United States, the President has, on due consideration, thought proper to accept the overture. To give effect to this arrangement, it was necessary that a new commission should be formed, and, for that purpose, that a new nomination should be made to the Senate, by whose advice and consent this important trust is committed to you.

You will consider the instructions given to the commission to treat under the mediation of Russia as applicable to the negotiation with which you are now charged, except as they may be modified by this letter.

I shall call your attention to the most important grounds of the controversy with Great Britain only, and make such remarks on each, and on the whole subject, as have occurred since the date of the former instructions, and are deemed applicable to the present juncture, taking into view the negotiation in which you are now about to engage.

On impressment—as to the right of the United States to be exempted from it—I have nothing new to add. The sentiments of the President have undergone no change on that important subject. This degrading practice must cease; our flag must protect the crew, or the United States cannot consider themselves an independent nation. To settle this difference amicably, the President is willing, as you are already informed by the former instructions, to remove all pretext for it to the British Government, by excluding all British seamen from our vessels; and even to extend the exclusion to all British subjects, if necessary, excepting only the few already naturalized; and to stipulate, likewise, the surrender of all British seamen deserting in our ports in future from British vessels, public or private. It was presumed by all dispassionate persons, that the late law of Congress relative to seamen would effectually accomplish the object. But the President is willing, as you find, to prevent a possibility of failure, to go further.

Should a treaty be made, it is proper, and it would have a conciliatory effect, that all our impressed seamen who may be discharged under it should be paid for their services by the British Government, for the time of their detention, the wages which they might have obtained in the merchant service of their own country.

Blockade is the subject next in point of importance, which you will have to arrange. In the instructions bearing date on the 15th of April, 1813, it was remarked that, as the British Government had revoked its Orders in Council, and agreed that no blockade could be legal which was not supported by an adequate force, and that such adequate force should be applied to any blockade which it might thereafter institute, this cause of controversy seemed to be removed. Further reflection, however, has added great force to the expediency and importance of a precise definition of the public law on this subject. There is much cause to presume that, if the repeal of the Orders in Council had taken place in time to have been known here before the declaration of war, and had had the effect of preventing the declaration, not only that no provision would have been obtained against impressment, but that, under the name of blockade, the same extent of coast would have been covered by proclamation as had been covered by the Orders in Council. The war, which these abuses and impressment contributed so much to produce, might possibly prevent that consequence. But it would be more satisfactory, if not more safe, to guard against it by a formal definition in the treaty. It is true, should the British Government violate again the legitimate principles of blockade, in whatever terms or under whatever pretext it might be done, the United States would have in their hands a correspondent resort; but a principal object in making peace is to prevent, by the justice and reciprocity of the conditions, a recurrence again to war for the same cause. If the British Government sincerely wishes to make a durable peace with the United States, it can have no reasonable objection to a just definition of blockade, especially as the two Governments have agreed, in their correspondence, in all its essential features. The instructions of the 15th of April, 1813, have stated in what manner the President is willing to arrange this difference.

On the other neutral rights enumerated in the former instructions, I shall remark only that the catalogue is limited in a manner to evince a spirit of accommodation; that the arrangement proposed in each instance is just in itself; that it corresponds with the general spirit of treaties between commercial Powers; and that Great Britain has sanctioned it in many treaties, and gone beyond it in some.

On the claim to indemnity for spoiliations, I have only to refer you to what was said in the former instructions. I have to add, that should a treaty be formed, it is just in itself, and would have a happy effect on the future relations of the two countries, if indemnity should be stipulated on each side for the destruction of all unfortified towns, and other private property, contrary to the laws and usages of war. It is equally proper that the negroes taken from the Southern States should be returned to their owners, or paid for at their full value. It is known that a shameful traffic has been carried on in the West Indies, by the sale of these persons there, by those who professed to be their deliverers. Of this fact, the proof which has reached this Department shall be furnished you. If these slaves are considered as non-combatants, they ought to be restored; if as property, they ought to be paid for. The Treaty of Peace contains an article which recognises this principle.

In the view which I have taken of the conditions on which you are to insist in the proposed negotiation, you will find, on a comparison of them with those stated in the former instructions, that there is no material difference between them, the two last mentioned claims to indemnity excepted, which have originated since the date of those instructions. The principal object of this review has been to show that the sentiments of the President are the same in every instance, and that the reasons for maintaining them have become more evident and strong since the date of those instructions.

In accepting the overture of the British Government to treat independently of the Russian mediation, the United States have acted on principles which have governed them in every transaction relating to peace since the war. Had the British Government accepted the Russian mediation, the United States would have treated for themselves, independently of any other Power; and had Great Britain met them on just conditions, peace would have been the immediate result. Had she refused to accede to such conditions, and attempted to dictate others, a knowledge of the views of other Powers on those points might have been useful to the United States. In agreeing to treat directly with Great Britain, not only is no concession contemplated on any point in controversy, but the same desire is cherished to preserve a good understanding with Russia and the other Baltic Powers, as if the negotiation had taken place under the mediation of Russia.

[Confidential paragraph No. 2, omitted.]

It is probable that the British Government may have declined the Russian mediation from the apprehension of an understanding between the United States and Russia for very different purposes from those which have been contemplated, in the hope that a much better treaty might be obtained of the United States, in a direct negotiation, than could be obtained under the Russian mediation, and with a view to profit of the concessions which might thus be made by the United States in future negotiations with the Baltic Powers. If this was the object of the British Government, (and it is not easy to conceive any other,) it clearly proves the advantage to be derived, in the proposed negotiation, from the aid of those Powers, in securing from the British Government such conditions as would be satisfactory to all parties. It would be highly honorable as well as advantageous to the United States, if the negotiation with which you are charged should terminate in such a treaty.

Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, to the Plenipotentiaries of the United States at Gottenburg.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 30, 1814.

GENTLEMEN: In addition to the claims to indemnity, stated in your preceding instructions, I have to request your attention to the following, to which, it is presumed, there can be no objection:

On the declaration of war by the United States, there happened to be, in the ordinary course of commerce, several American vessels and cargoes in the ports of Great Britain, which were seized and condemned; and, in one instance, an American ship which fled from Algiers, in consequence of the declaration of war by the Dey, to Gibraltar, with the American Consul and some public stores on board, shared a like fate.

After the declaration of war, Congress passed an act allowing to British subjects six months, from the date of the declaration, to remove their property out of the United States, in consequence of which many vessels were removed, with their cargoes. I add, with confidence, that, on a liberal construction of the spirit of the law, some vessels were permitted to depart, even after the expiration of the term specified in the law. I will endeavor to put in your possession a list of these cases. A general reciprocal provision, however, will be best adapted to the object in view.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

From the Secretary of State to the Commissioners of the United States for treating with Great Britain.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 10 1814.

GENTLEMEN: Should you conclude a treaty, and not obtain a satisfactory arrangement of neutral rights, it will be proper for you to provide that the United States shall have advantage of any stipulations more favorable to neutral nations, that may be established between Great Britain and other Powers. A precedent for such a provision is found in a declaratory article between Great Britain and Russia, bearing date on the 8th October, 1801, explanatory of the second section third article of a convention concluded between them on the 5th of June of the same year.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Extract—The Secretary of State to the Commissioners of the United States for treating with Great Britain.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 14, 1814.

I received last night your letter of the 15th October, with extracts of letters from Mr. Adams and Mr. Harris of the 22d and 23d of November.

It appears that you had no knowledge, at the date even of the last letter, of the answer of the British Government to the offer which had been made to it a second time of the Russian mediation. Hence it is to be inferred that the proposition made to this Government, by the Bramble, was made not only without your knowledge, but without the sanction, if not without the knowledge, of the Emperor. Intelligence from other sources strengthens this inference. If this view of the conduct of the British Government is well founded, the motive for it cannot be mistaken. It may fairly be presumed that it was to prevent a good understanding and concert between the United States and Russia and Sweden, on the subject of neutral rights, in the hope that by drawing the negotiation to England, and depriving you of an opportunity of free communication with those Powers, a treaty less favorable to the United States might be obtained, which might afterwards be used with advantage by Great Britain in her negotiations with those Powers.

By an article in the former instructions, you were authorized, in making a treaty to prevent impressment from our vessels, to stipulate, provided a certain term could not be agreed on, that it might continue in force for the present war in Europe only. At that time it seemed probable that the war might last many years. Recent appearances, however, indicate the contrary. Should peace be made in Europe, as the practical evil of which we complain, in regard to impressment, would cease, it is presumed that the British Government would have less objection to a stipulation to forbear that practice for a specified term, than it would have should the war continue. In concluding a peace with Great Britain, even in case of a previous general peace in Europe, it is important to the United States to obtain such a stipulation.

Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, to the Plenipotentiaries of the United States at Gottenburg.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 21, 1814.

GENTLEMEN: By the cartel Chauncey you will receive this, with duplicates of the commission to treat with Great Britain, and of the instructions and other documents that were forwarded by the John Adams. This vessel is sent to guard against any accident which might attend the other.

[Confidential paragraph omitted.]

If a satisfactory arrangement can be concluded with Great Britain, the sooner it is accomplished the happier for both countries. If such an arrangement cannot be obtained, it is important to the United States to be acquainted with it without delay. I hope, therefore, to receive from you an account of the state of the negotiation and its prospects, as soon as you may be able to communicate anything of an interesting nature respecting them.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Monroe to the Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 25, 1814.

GENTLEMEN: No communication has been received from the joint mission which was appointed to meet the Commissioners of the British Government at Gottenburg. A letter from Mr. Bayard at Amsterdam, of the 18th of March, was the last from either of our Commissioners. It was inferred from that letter, and other communications, that Mr. Bayard, Mr. Gallatin, and Mr. Adams, would be in Gottenburg; and it has been understood from other sources that Mr. Clay and Mr. Russell had arrived there about the 15th of April. It is, therefore, expected that a meeting will have taken place in May, and that we shall soon be made acquainted with your sentiments of the probable result of the negotiation.

It is impossible, with the lights which have reached us, to ascertain the present disposition of the British Government towards an accommodation with the United States. We think it probable that the late events in France may have had a tendency to increase its pretensions.

At war with Great Britain, and injured by France, the United States have sustained the attitude founded on those relations. No reliance was placed on the good offices of France in bringing the war with Great Britain to a satisfactory conclusion. Looking steadily to an honorable peace, and the ultimate attainment of justice from both Powers, the President has endeavored, by a consistent and honorable policy, to take advantage of every circumstance that might promote that result. He, nevertheless, knew that France held a place in the political system of Europe and of the world, which, as a check on England, could not fail to be useful to us. What effect the late events may have had, in these respects, is the important circumstance of which you are, doubtless, better informed than we can be.

The President accepted the mediation of Russia from a respect for the character of the Emperor, and a belief that our cause, in all the points in controversy, would gain strength by being made known to him. On the same principle he preferred (in accepting the British overture to treat independently of the Russian mediation) to open the negotiation on the Continent rather than at London.

It was inferred from the general policy of Russia, and the friendly sentiments and interposition of the Emperor, that a respect for both would have much influence with the British Cabinet in promoting a pacific policy towards us. The manner, however, in which it is understood that a general pacification is taking place; the influence Great Britain may have in modifying the arrangements involved in it; the resources she may be able to employ exclusively against the United States; and the uncertainty of the precise course which Russia may pursue in relation to the war between the United States and Great Britain, naturally claim attention, and raise the important question in reference to the subject of impressment, on which it is presumed your negotiations will essentially turn, whether your powers ought not to be enlarged so as to enable you to give to those circumstances all the weight to which they may be entitled. On full consideration it has been decided, that, in case no stipulation can be obtained from the British Government at this moment, when its pretensions may have been much heightened by recent events, and the state of Europe be most favorable to them, either relinquishing the claim to impress from American vessels, or discontinuing the practice, even in consideration of the proposed exclusion from them of British seamen, you may concur in an article stipulating that the subject of impressment, together with that of commerce between the two countries, be referred to a separate negotiation, to be undertaken without delay, at such place as you may be able to agree on, preferring this city if to be obtained. I annex at the close of this letter a project of an article expressing more distinctly the idea which it is intended to communicate, not meaning thereby to restrain you in any respect as to the form. Commerce and seamen, the objects of impressment, may, with great propriety, be arranged in the same instrument. By stipulating that Commissioners shall forthwith be appointed for the purpose, and that all rights on this subject shall, in the meantime, be reserved, the faith of the British Government will be pledged to a fair experiment in an amicable mode, and the honor and rights of the United States secured. The United States having resisted by war the practice of impressment, and continued the war until that practice had ceased by a peace in Europe, their object has been essentially obtained for the present. It may reasonably be expected that the arrangement contemplated and provided for, will take effect before a new war in Europe shall furnish an occasion for reviving the practice. Should this arrangement, however, fail, and the practice be again revived, the United States will again be at liberty to repel it by war, and that they will do so cannot be doubted; for after the proof which they have already given of a firm resistance in that mode, persevered in until the practice had ceased, under circumstances the most favorable, it cannot be presumed that the practice will ever be tolerated again. Certain it is, that every day will render it more ineligible in Great Britain to make the attempt.

In contemplating the appointment of Commissioners, to be made after the ratification of the present treaty, to negotiate and conclude a treaty to regulate commerce, and provide against impressment, it is meant only to show the extent to which you may go, in a spirit of accommodation, if necessary. Should the British Government be willing to take the subject up immediately with you, it would be much preferred, in which case the proposed article would, of course, be adapted to the purpose.

Information has been received, from a quarter deserving attention, that the late events in France have produced such an effect on the British Government as to make it probable that a demand will be made at Gottenburg to surrender our right to the fisheries; to abandon all trade beyond the Cape of Good Hope; and to cede Louisiana to Spain. We cannot believe that such a demand will be made. Should it be, you will of course treat it as it deserves. These rights must not be brought into discussion. If insisted on, your negotiations will cease.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, gentlemen, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

Whereas, by the peace in Europe, the essential causes of the war between the United States, and Great Britain, and particularly the practice of impressment, have ceased, and a sincere desire exists to arrange, in a manner satisfactory to both parties, all questions concerning seamen, and it is also their desire and intention to arrange, in a like satisfactory manner, the commerce between the two countries, it is therefore agreed that Commissioners shall forthwith be appointed on each side, to meet at —, with full power to negotiate and conclude a treaty, as soon as may be practicable, for the arrangement of those important interests. It is, nevertheless, understood, that, until such treaty be formed, each party shall retain all its rights, and that all American citizens who have been impressed into the British service shall be forthwith discharged.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, to the joint Commissioners of the United States for treating of peace with Great Britain, dated,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 27, 1814.

The omission to send Ministers to Gottenburg, without a previous and official notification of the appointment and arrival there of those of the United States, a formality, which, if due from either party, might have been expected from that making the overture, rather than that accepting it, is a proof of a dilatory policy, and would, in other respects, justify animadversions, if there was less disposition here to overlook circumstances of form, when interfering with more substantial objects.

By my letter of the 25th instant, which goes with this, you will find that the subject had already been acted on under similar impressions with those which Mr. Bayard and Mr. Gallatin's letter could not fail to produce. The view, however, presented by them is much stronger, and entitled to much greater attention. The President has taken the subject into consideration again, and given to their suggestions all the weight to which they are justly entitled.

On mature consideration, it has been decided, that, under all the circumstances alluded to, incident to a prosecution of the war, you may omit any stipulation on the subject of impressment, if found indispensably necessary to terminate it. You will, of course, not recur to this expedient until all your efforts to adjust the controversy in a more satisfactory manner have failed. As it is not the intention of the United States, in suffering the treaty to be silent on the subject of impressment, to admit the British claim thereon, or to relinquish that of the United States, it is highly important that any such inference be entirely precluded, by a declaration or protest, in some form or other, that the omission is not to have any such effect or tendency. Any modification of the practice, to prevent abuses, being an acknowledgment of the right in Great Britain, is utterly inadmissible.

Although Gottenburg was contemplated at the time your commission was made out, as the seat of the negotiation, yet your commission itself does not confine you to it. You are at liberty, therefore, to transfer the negotiation to any other place made more eligible by a change of circumstances. Amsterdam and the Hague readily present themselves as preferable to any place in England. If, however, you should be of opinion that, under all circumstances, the negotiation in that country will be attended with advantages outweighing the objections to it, you are at liberty to transfer it there.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to the Commissioners of the United States for treating of peace with Great Britain, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

August 11, 1814.

I had the honor to receive, on the 3d of this month, a letter from Mr. Bayard and Mr. Gallatin, of the 23d of May, and one from Mr. Gallatin of the 2d of June.

The President approves the arrangement communicated by those gentlemen for transferring the negotiation with the British Government from Gottenburg to Ghent. It is presumed, from Mr. Gallatin's letter, that the meeting took place towards the latter end of June, and that we shall soon hear from you what will be its probable result.

By my letters of the 25th and 27th of June, of which another copy is now forwarded, the sentiments of the President, as to the conditions on which it will be proper for you to conclude a treaty of peace, are made known to you. It is presumed that either in the mode suggested in my letter of the 25th of June, which is much preferred, or by permitting the treaty to be silent on the subject, as is authorized in the letter of the 27th of June, the question of impressment may be so disposed of as to form no obstacle to a pacification. This Government can go no further, because it will make no sacrifice of the rights or honor of the nation.

If Great Britain does not terminate the war on the conditions which you are authorized to adopt, she has other objects in it than those for which she has hitherto professed to contend. That such are entertained, there is much reason to presume. These, whatever they may be, must and will be resisted by the United States. The conflict may be severe, but it will be borne with firmness, and, as we confidently believe, be attended with success.

From the Commissioners Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States for treating of peace with Great Britain, to the Secretary of State, dated GHENT, August 12, 1814.

SIR: We have the honor to inform you that the British Commissioners, Lord Gambier, Henry Goulburn, Esq., and William Adams, Esq., arrived in this city on Saturday evening, the 6th instant. The day after their arrival, Mr. Baker, their secretary, called upon us to give us notice of the fact, and to propose a meeting at a certain hour on the ensuing day. The place having been agreed upon, we accordingly met at one o'clock on Monday, the 8th instant.

We enclose, herewith, a copy of the full powers exhibited by the British Commissioners at that conference, which was opened, on their part, by an expression of the sincere and earnest desire of their Government that the negotiation might result in a solid peace, honorable to both parties. They, at the same time, declared that no events which had occurred since the first proposal for this negotiation had altered the pacific disposition of their Government, or varied its views as to the terms upon which it was willing to conclude the peace.

We answered, that we heard these declarations with great satisfaction, and that our Government had acceded to the proposal of negotiation, with the most sincere desire to put an end to the differences which divided the two countries, and to lay, upon just and liberal grounds, the foundation of a peace which, securing the rights and interests of both nations, should unite them by lasting bonds of amity.

The British Commissioners then stated the following subjects as those upon which it appeared to them that the discussions would be likely to turn, and on which they were instructed:

1st. The forcible seizure of mariners on board of merchant vessels, and, in connexion with it, the claim of His Britannic Majesty to the allegiance of all the native subjects of Great Britain.

We understood them to intimate that the British Government did not propose this point as one which they were particularly desirous of discussing; but that, as it had occupied so prominent a place in the dispute between the two countries, it necessarily attracted notice, and was considered as a subject which would come under discussion.

2d. The Indian allies of Great Britain to be included in the pacification, and a definite boundary to be settled for their territory.

The British Commissioners stated that an arrangement upon this point was a sine qua non; that they were not authorized to conclude a treaty of peace which did not embrace the Indians as allies of His Britannic Majesty; and that the establishment of a definite boundary of the Indian territory was necessary to secure a permanent peace, not only with the Indians, but also between the United States and Great Britain.

3d. A revision of the boundary line between the United States and the adjacent British colonies.

With respect to this point, they expressly disclaimed any intention, on the part of their Government, to acquire an increase of territory, and represented the proposed revision as intended merely for the purpose of preventing uncertainty and dispute.

After having stated these three points as subjects of discussion, the British Commissioners added, that before they desired any answer from us, they felt it incumbent upon them to declare, that the British Government did not deny the right of the Americans to the fisheries generally, or in the open seas; but that the privileges formerly granted by treaty to the United States, of fishing within the limits of the British jurisdiction, and of landing and drying fish on the shores of the British territories, would not be renewed without an equivalent.

The extent of what was considered by them as waters peculiarly British, was not stated. From the manner in which they brought this subject into view, they seemed to wish us to understand that they were not anxious that it should be discussed, and that they only intended to give us notice that these privileges had ceased to exist, and would not be again granted without an equivalent, nor unless we thought proper to provide expressly in the treaty of peace for their renewal.

The British Commissioners having stated that these were all the subjects which they intended to bring forward, or to suggest, requested to be informed whether we were instructed to enter into negotiation on these several points, and whether there was any among these which we thought it unnecessary to bring into the negotiation? and they desired us to state, on our part, such other subjects as we might intend to propose for discussion in the course of the negotiation. The meeting was then adjourned to the next day, in order to afford us the opportunity of a consultation among ourselves, before we gave an answer.

In the course of the evening of the same day, we received your letters of the 25th and 27th of June.

There could be no hesitation on our part in informing the British Commissioners that we were not instructed on the subjects of Indian pacification or boundary, and of fisheries; nor did it seem probable, although neither of these points had been stated with sufficient precision in the first verbal conference, that they could be admitted in any shape. We did not wish, however, to prejudge the result, or, by any hasty proceeding, abruptly to break off the negotiation. It was not impossible that, on the subject of the Indians, the British Government had received erroneous impressions from the Indian traders in Canada, which our representations might remove. And it appeared, at all events, important to ascertain distinctly the precise intentions of Great Britain on both points. We, therefore, thought it advisable to invite the British Commissioners to a general conversation on all the points; stating to them, at the same time, our want of instructions on two of them, and holding out no expectation of the probability of our agreeing to any article respecting these.

At our meeting on the ensuing day, we informed the British Commissioners that, upon the first and third points proposed by them, we were provided with instructions; and we presented as further subjects considered by our Government as suitable for discussion—

1st. A definition of blockade, and, as far as might be mutually agreed, of other neutral and belligerent rights.

2d. Claims of indemnity in certain cases of capture and seizure.

We then stated that the two subjects, first, of Indian pacification and boundary; second, of fisheries, were not embraced by our instructions. We observed, that as these points had not been heretofore the grounds of any controversy between the Government of Great Britain and that of the United States, and had not been alluded to by Lord Castlereagh in his letter proposing the negotiation, it could not be expected that they should have been anticipated and made the subject of instructions by our Government. That it was natural to be supposed that our instructions were confined to those subjects upon which differences between the two countries were known to exist; and that the proposition to define, in the treaty between the United States and Great Britain the boundary of the Indian possessions within our own territories, was new and without example. No such provision had been inserted in the Treaty of Peace in 1783, nor in any other treaty between the two countries. No such provision had, to our knowledge, ever been inserted in any treaty made by Great Britain, or any other European Power, in relation to the same description of people, existing under like circumstances. We would say, however, that it could not be doubted that peace with the Indians would certainly follow a peace with Great Britain; that we had information that commissioners had already been appointed to treat with them; that a treaty to that effect might, perhaps, have been already concluded; and that the United States, having no interest nor any motive to continue a separate war against the Indians, there could never be a moment when our Government would not be disposed to make peace with them.

Relations with Great Britain.

We then expressed our wish to receive from the British Commissioners a statement of the views and objects of Great Britain upon all the points, and our willingness to discuss them all, in order that, even if no arrangement could be agreed on upon the points not included in our instructions, the Government of the United States might be possessed of the entire and precise intentions of that of Great Britain respecting these points; and that the British Government might be fully informed of the objections, on the part of the United States, to any such arrangement.

In answer to our remark, that these points had not been alluded to by Lord Castlereagh in his letter proposing the negotiation, it was said that it could not be expected that, in a letter merely intended to invite a negotiation, he should enumerate the topics of discussion, or state the pretensions of his Government, since these would depend upon ulterior events, and might arise out of a subsequent state of things.

In reply to our observation, that the proposed stipulation of an Indian boundary was without example in the practice of European nations, it was asserted that the Indians must in some sort be considered as an independent people, since treaties were made with them both by Great Britain and by the United States; upon which we pointed out the obvious and important difference between the treaties we might make with Indians living in our territory and such a treaty as was proposed to be made respecting them with a foreign Power, who had solemnly acknowledged the territory on which they resided to be part of the United States.

We were then asked by the British Commissioners, whether, in case they should enter further upon the discussion of the several points which had been stated, we could expect that it would terminate by some provisional arrangement on the points on which we had no instructions, particularly on that respecting the Indians, which arrangement would be subject to the ratification of our Government.

We answered, that before the subjects were distinctly understood, and the objects in view more precisely disclosed, we could not decide whether it would be possible to form any satisfactory article on the subject, nor pledge ourselves as to the exercise of a discretion under our powers, even with respect to a provisional agreement. We added, that, as we should deeply deplore a rupture of the negotiation on any point, it was our anxious desire to employ all possible means to avert an event so serious in its consequences; and that we had not been without hopes that a discussion might correct the effect of any erroneous information which the British Government might have received on the subject which they had proposed as a preliminary basis.

We took this opportunity to remark, that no nation observed a policy more liberal and humane towards the Indians than that pursued by the United States; that our object had been, by all practicable means, to introduce civilization among them; that their possessions were secured to them by well-defined boundaries; that their persons, lands, and other property, were now more effectually protected against violence or frauds, from any quarter, than they had been under any former Government; that even our citizens were not allowed to purchase their lands; that when they gave up their title to any portion of their country to the United States, it was by voluntary treaty with our Government, who gave them a satisfactory equivalent; and that through these means the United States had succeeded in preserving, since the Treaty of Greenville of 1795, an uninterrupted peace of sixteen years with all the Indian tribes—a period of tranquillity much longer than they were known to have enjoyed heretofore.

It was then expressly stated on our part, that the proposition respecting the Indians was not distinctly understood. We asked whether the pacification and the settlement of a boundary for them were both made a sine qua non? which was answered in the affirmative. The question was then asked the British Commissioners, whether the proposed Indian boundary was intended to preclude the United States from the right of purchasing by treaty from the Indians, without the consent of Great Britain, lands lying beyond that boundary, and as a restriction upon the Indians from selling, by amicable treaties, lands to the United States, as had been hitherto practised?

To this question it was first answered, by one of the Commissioners, that the Indians would not be restricted from selling their lands, but that the United States would be restricted from purchasing them; and, on reflection, another of the Commissioners stated that it was intended that the Indian territories should be a barrier between the British dominions and those of the United States; that both Great Britain and the United States should be restricted from purchasing their lands; but that the Indians might sell them to a third party.

The proposition respecting Indian boundaries, thus explained, and connected with the right of sovereignty ascribed to the Indians over the country, amounted to nothing less than a demand of the absolute cession of the rights both of sovereignty and of soil. We cannot abstain from remarking to you, that the subject of Indian boundary was indistinctly stated when first proposed, and that the explanations were at first obscure, and always given with reluctance; and it was declared, from the first moment, to be a sine qua non, rendering any discussion unprofitable until it was admitted as a basis. Knowing that we had no power to cede to the Indians any part of our territory, we thought it unnecessary to ask, what probably would not have been answered till the principle was admitted, where the line of demarcation of the Indian country was proposed to be established.

The British Commissioners, after having repeated that their instructions on the subject of the Indians were peremptory, stated that, unless we could give some assurance that our powers would allow us to make at least a provisional arrangement on the subject, any further discussion would be fruitless; and that they must consult their own Government on this state of things. They proposed, accordingly, a suspension of the conferences until they should have received an answer; it being understood that each party might call a meeting whenever they had any propositions to submit. They despatched a special messenger the same evening, and we are now waiting for the result.

Before the proposed adjournment took place, it was agreed that there should be a protocol of the conferences; that a statement should, for that purpose, be drawn up by each party; and that we should meet the next day to compare the statements. We accordingly met again on Wednesday, the 10th instant, and ultimately agreed on what should constitute the protocol of the conferences. A copy of this instrument we have the honor to transmit with this despatch; and we also enclose a copy of the statement originally drawn up on our part, for the purpose of making known to you the passages to which the British Commissioners objected.

Their objection to some of the passages was, that they appeared to be argumentative, and that the object of the protocol was to contain a mere statement of facts. They, however, objected to the insertion of the answer which they had given to our question respecting the effect of the proposed Indian boundary; but they agreed to an alteration of their original proposition on that subject, which renders it much more explicit than as stated, either in the first conference or in their proposed draught of the protocol. They also objected to the insertion of the fact, that they had proposed to adjourn the conferences until they could obtain further instructions from their Government. The return of their messenger may, perhaps, disclose the motive of their reluctance in that respect.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
J. A. BAYARD.

Draught of original Protocol, made by the American Ministers, of the two first conferences held with the British Commissioners.

At a meeting between the Commissioners of His Britannic Majesty and those of the United States of America, for negotiating and concluding a peace, held at Ghent, 5th August, 1814, the following points were presented, by the Commissioners on the part of Great Britain, as subjects for discussion:

1. The forcible seizure of mariners on board of merchant vessels, and the claim of allegiance of His Britannic Majesty upon all the native born subjects of Great Britain.

2. The Indian allies of Great Britain to be included in the pacification, and a boundary to be settled between the dominions of the Indians and those of the United States. Both parts of this point are considered by the British Government as a sine qua non to the conclusion of the treaty.

3. The revision of the boundary line between the territories of the United States and those of Great Britain adjoining them, in North America.

4. The fisheries, respecting which the British Government will not allow the people of the United States the privilege of landing and drying fish, within the territorial jurisdiction of Great Britain, without an equivalent.

The American Commissioners were requested to say whether their instructions from their Government authorized them to treat upon these several points; and to state, on their part, such other points as they might be further instructed to propose for discussion.

The meeting was adjourned to Tuesday, the 9th August, on which day the Commissioners met again.

The American Commissioners, at this meeting, stated that, upon the first and third points proposed* by the British Commissioners, they were provided with instructions from their Government; and that on the second and fourth of these points, there not having existed heretofore any differences between the two Governments, they had not been anticipated by the Government of the United States, and were, therefore, not provided for in their instructions. That, in relation to an Indian pacification, they knew that the Government of the United States had appointed commissioners to treat of peace with the Indians; and that it was not improbable that peace had been made with them.

The American Commissioners presented, as further points [subjects] considered by the Government of the United States as suitable for discussion—

1. A definition of blockade, and, as far as may be agreed, of other neutral and belligerent rights.

2. Certain claims of indemnity to individuals for captures and seizures preceding and subsequent to the war.

3. They further stated that there were various other points, to which their instructions extended, which might, with propriety, be objects of discussion, either in the negotiation of the peace or in that of a treaty of commerce, which, in the case of a propitious termination of the present conferences, they were likewise authorized to conclude. That, for the purpose of facilitating the first and most essential object of peace, they had discarded every subject which was not considered peculiarly connected with that, and presented only those points which appeared to be immediately relevant to this negotiation.

The American Commissioners expressed their wish to receive from the British Commissioners a statement of the views and objects of Great Britain upon all the points, and their willingness to discuss them all, in order that, if no arrangement could be agreed to upon the points not in their instructions, which would come within the scope of the powers committed to their discretion, the Government of the United States might be put in possession of the entire and precise intentions of that of Great Britain with regard to such points; and that the British Government might be fully informed of the objections, on the part of the United States, to any such arrangement.

They, the American Commissioners, were asked whether, if those of Great Britain should enter further upon the discussion, particularly respecting the Indian boundary, the American Commissioners could expect that it would terminate by some provisional arrangement, which they could conclude, subject to the ratification of their Government?

They answered that, as any arrangement to which they could agree upon the subject must be without specific authority from their Government, it was not possible for them, previous to discussion, to decide whether an article on the subject could be formed which would be mutually satisfactory, and to which they should think themselves, under their discretionary powers, justified in acceding.

The British Commissioners declined entering upon the discussion, unless the American Commissioners would say that they considered it within their discretion to make a provisional arrangement on the subject, conformable to the view of it prescribed by the British Government, and proposed to adjourn the conferences for the purpose of consulting their own Government on this state of things.
